This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. ISSUED ON THE FIFTH OF EACH MONTH

VOLUME XXVII — July, 1905 — NUMBER ONE

THE ST. LOUIS INCIDENT.

Brief Resume, With Documents.

ON Monday evening, June 5, the president of Typographical Union No. 8 telephoned the headquarters of the International Typographical Union at Indianapolis, and said that at a regular meeting held on June 4, St. Louis Typographical Union had instructed its officers to sign a contract for three years with the St. Louis Typothetæ, this contract to be on a nine-hour basis for the contract period. On Tuesday, June 6, the International secretary-treasurer visited St. Louis and protested against the signing of a nine-hour contract, explaining that it was illegal and in contravention of International law. On Wednesday, June 7, the executive council considered the St. Louis situation, in Kansas City, where it was then holding a conference with representatives of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association. As a result of the consideration of the St. Louis matter, the following telegrams were sent:

BOTH PARTIES DULY WARNED.

(Telegram.)

KANSAS CITY, MO., June 7, 1905.

Ernest S. Hart, President St. Louis Typothetæ, Care of R. B. Studley & Co., St. Louis, Mo.:

Executive council International Typographical Union formally notifies you, as president St. Louis Typothetæ, that any contract made with St. Louis Typographical Union No. 8, without first receiving the council's approval, will be repudiated as null and void, as provided by our laws.

JAMES M. LYNCH,
HUGO MILLER,
J. W. BRAMWOOD.

(Telegram.)

KANSAS CITY, MO., June 7, 1905.

Joseph A. Jackson, 408 Burlington Building, 910 Olive Street, St. Louis, Mo.:

By action St. Louis convention, ratified by referendum, contracts extending beyond January 1, and not including eight-hour day, to become effective on January 1, will be illegal and will be repudiated by council. Representatives of No. 8 at Indianapolis and Detroit further ratified eight-hour plan, and agreed that contracts before being entered into should receive approval of executive council. Therefore executive council will not recognize any contract that has not received its approval, and has today so notified the St. Louis typothetæ.

JAMES M. LYNCH,
HUGO MILLER,
J. W. BRAMWOOD.

The executive council attended a special meeting of St. Louis Typographical Union No. 8, held on the evening of Thursday, June 9, and again protested against the ratification of a three-year contract on a nine-hour basis, and pointed out the International law, the compacts entered into by No. 8 at Indianapolis and Detroit and the provisions of the eight-hour plan endorsed by the referendum. The council urged No. 8 to stand firmly for the eight-hour day. But despite the emphatic protest of the council, the officers of No. 8 were again instructed, in compliance with their recommendation and advice, to sign the illegal contract. The following documents explain further steps in the St. Louis case:

BOTH PARTIES AGAIN WARNED.

J. A. Jackson, President St. Louis Typographical Union No. 8, 408 Burlington Building, St. Louis, Mo.:

NUMBER EIGHT'S CHARTER SUSPENDED.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., June 12, 1905.

At a meeting of the executive council of the International Typographical Union, at which all members were present, which convened at 9:30 A. M. on the above date, the following resolution was introduced and unanimously adopted by a roll-call vote:

Resolved, That the charter of St. Louis Typographical Union No. 8 be herewith suspended, in accordance with the provisions of section 2, article 10, of the constitution of the International Typographical Union, for failure and refusal to obey the laws and legal mandates of the International Typographical Union and executive council, and the instructions of the executive council. Said suspension to take effect immediately (9:45 A. M., June 12, 1905) and continue in effect until St. Louis Typographical Union No. 8 complies with the laws and legal mandates of the International Typographical Union and executive council, and until the charter of the union has been reinstated by the executive council.

JAMES M. LYNCH,
HUGO MILLER,
J. W. BRAMWOOD.

The foregoing action was immediately telegraphed to the officers of No. 8, and an official letter, under seal, forwarded by first mail.

(Telegram.)

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., June 12, 1905.

E. S. Hart, President St. Louis Typothetæ, Care R. B. Studley & Co., St. Louis, Mo.:

Following the telegrams sent you on June 7 and 9, the executive council of the International Typographical Union formally notifies you, as president of St. Louis Typothetæ, that the charter of the St. Louis Typographical Union has been suspended for violation of International law, in entering into an illegal contract with St. Louis Typothetæ.

JAMES M. LYNCH,
HUGO MILLER,
J. W. BRAMWOOD,
Executive Council International Typographical Union.

The president of St. Louis Typographical Union was at headquarters on Thursday, June 15, and asked that the executive council so modify the order of suspension as to permit the issuance of traveling cards, payment of per capita, etc., the suspension of No. 8 to be nominal pending review of the case by the Toronto convention. After considering the request, the council declined to accede to it.

THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL'S POSITION.

(Letter.)

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., June 17, 1905.

Mr. Joseph A. Jackson, 1517 Benton Street, St. Louis, Mo.:

MY DEAR SIR—Confirming our conversation over the long-distance telephone today, I desire to say that the executive council stands just where it did on the evening of Thursday, June 8, as to the support of the members of No. 8 who may be locked out by the book and job employers in St. Louis, or who may be compelled to engage in a strike in order to conserve the law:

Provided, St. Louis Union repudiates the illegal nine-hour contract with the St. Louis Typothetæ, and reaffirms its allegiance to International law, the eight-hour demand and the eight-hour plan endorsed by the referendum of the International Typographical Union, and serves written notice on the St. Louis Typothetæ that this action has been taken.

Immediately after the action is taken and the council is furnished with an attested record of the action of the union, together with an attested copy of the notice to the St. Louis Typothetæ, No. 8 will be reinstated by the executive council.

Permit me to reiterate that if trouble should occur in St. Louis because of this action by the union, and after compliance with the International Typographical Union law, as set forth under the subdivision "Defense and Strikes" (page 66, Laws of 1905), then the executive council will support the reinstated union.

Pending action by the special meeting of No. 8, which you inform me is to be held tomorrow, no further steps will be taken by the council.

Fraternally, JAMES M. LYNCH.

Approved: J. W. BRAMWOOD.

ed at a special meeting of St. Louis Typographical Union No. 8, held on June 18:

"Resolved, That St. Louis Typographical Union No. 8, assembled in special meeting to 'consider the suspension of the charter and the new scale,' instructs the president and the secretary-treasurer of the union to immediately notify the executive council of the International Typographical Union by telegraph, and at the earliest possible moment in writing under our official seal, that Typographical Union No. 8 hereby submits to the law as declared by the council, and will observe and obey the same; and that all legislation by this union in connection with the recently enacted job scale be and is hereby rescinded. And that our officers are further instructed to request the council to notify the union as soon as may be of the revocation of the order suspending No. 8's charter.

"Resolved, That in the opinion of the union this action is not an action upon the scale, within the meaning of the law, but is a compliance with the law as declared by the executive council, and is necessary in the emergency now confronting the union in order to preserve our charter rights pending an appeal to the convention of the International Typographical Union." AN EXCHANGE OF MESSAGES.

INDIANAPOLIS, June 20, 1905.

J. A. Jackson, 408 Burlington Building, St. Louis, Mo.:

Acting on the first resolution contained in the communication of June 19, addressed to the executive council, signed by J. A. Jackson, as president Typographical Union No. 8, and J. J. Early, as secretary-treasurer, the executive council has today revoked the order suspending the charter of Typographical Union No. 8. This action is taken with the understanding on the part of the executive council that No. 8 in the first resolution declares its allegiance to International law, and that the illegal nine-hour contract recently entered into between No. 8 and the St. Louis Typothetæ has been rescinded, and that No. 8 has placed itself in position to co-operate in eight-hour campaign and fulfil its pledges made at Indianapolis and Detroit, and that no contract will be entered into without full compliance with International law. Answer at once if council's understanding is correct, and then formal letter reinstating charter of No. 8 will follow, reinstatement to take effect at 12 o'clock noon today.

NUMBER EIGHT'S CHARTER REINSTATED.

(Letter.)

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., June 20, 1905.

J. A. Jackson, President, and J. J. Early, Secretary, St. Louis Typographical Union No. 8:

GENTLEMEN—At a meeting of the executive council held this day, the following resolutions were adopted:

Whereas, The executive council did, on June 12, 1905, resolve "That the charter of St. Louis Typographical Union No. 8 be herewith suspended, in accordance with the provisions of section 2, article 10, of the constitution of the International Typographical Union, for failure and refusal to obey the laws and legal mandates of the International Typographical Union and executive council, and the instructions of the executive council. Said suspension to take effect immediately (9:45 A. M., June 12, 1905) and continue in effect until St. Louis Typographical Union No. 8 complies with the laws and legal mandates of the International Typographical Union and the executive council, and until the charter of the union has been reinstated by the executive council;" and,

Whereas, The International president did on June 17, 1905, with the approval of his colleagues on the executive council, write Mr. Joseph A. Jackson as follows: "Confirming our conversation over the long-distance telephone today, I desire to say that the executive council stands just where it did on the evening of Thursday, June 8, as to the support of the members of No. 8 who may be locked out by the book and job employers in St. Louis, or who may be compelled to engage in a strike in order to conserve the law: Provided, St. Louis Union repudiates the illegal nine-hour contract with the St. Louis Typothetæ and reaffirms its allegiance to International law, the eight-hour demand and the eight-hour plan endorsed by the referendum of the International Typographical Union, and serves written notice on the St. Louis Typothetæ that this action has been taken. Immediately after the action is taken and the council is furnished with an attested record of the action of the union, together with an attested copy of the notice to the St. Louis Typothetæ, No. 8 will be reinstated by the executive council;" and,

Whereas, The executive council has been informed, under date of June 19, by J. A. Jackson, as president of Typographical Union No. 8, and J. J. Early, as secretary-treasurer, under seal of the union, that at a special meeting of St. Louis Typographical Union held on June 18, the following was adopted: "Resolved, That St. Louis Typographical Union No. 8, assembled in special meeting to 'consider the suspension of the charter and the new scale,' instructs the president and the secretary-treasurer of the union to immediately notify the executive council of the International Typographical Union by telegraph, and at the earliest possible moment in writing under our official seal, that Typographical Union No. 8 hereby submits to the law as declared by the council, and will observe and obey the same; and that all legislation by this union in connection with the recently enacted job scale be and is hereby rescinded;" and the officers above named have also submitted copy of letter to the St. Louis Typothetæ embodying the action taken by St. Louis Typographical Union No. 8.

Now, therefore, The executive council of the International Typographical Union, acting on the first resolution contained in the communication of June 19, addressed to the executive council, signed by J. A. Jackson, as president of Typographical Union No. 8, and J. J. Early, as secretary-treasurer, has today revoked the order suspending the charter of Typographical Union No. 8, this action being taken with the understanding on the part of the executive council that No. 8 in the resolution quoted heretofore declares its allegiance to International law, and that the illegal nine-hour contract recently entered into between No. 8 and the St. Louis Typothetæ has been rescinded, and that No. 8 has placed itself in position to co-operate in the eight-hour campaign and fulfil its pledges made in Indianapolis and Detroit, and that no contract will be entered into without full compliance with International law.

Resolved, That the order of suspension of the charter of Typographical Union No. 8, made by the executive council on June 12, 1905, be and is hereby revoked, the reinstatement to take effect at 12 o'clock noon, June 20, 1905.

I REJOICE at every effort workingmen make to organize. I do not care on what basis they do it. The mainspring of our progress is high wages—wages at such a level that the workingman can spare his wife to preside over a home, can command leisure, go to lectures, take a newspaper, and lift himself from the deadening routine of mere toil. That dollar left after all the bills are paid on Saturday night means education, independence, self-respect, manhood.—Wendell Phillips.

Note and Comment

EIGHT hours for work, eight hours for sleep, eight hours to do as we will.

WHEN some fellow begins to talk about high dues just remind him that the International burial benefit is a return of nearly seventeen years' dues to the parent body.

SO FAR Colorado Springs and Pittsburg are the only cities that have formally announced themselves as candidates for the convention in 1906, although there has been some talk of Houston, Texas, in this connection.

D. M. PARRY, talking delegate of the Citizens' Industrial Association, has resigned, and his place has been taken by Grapenuts Postum Post. THE JOURNAL congratulates the association on finding such a worthy successor to Parry.

THE Building Trades Council of San Francisco, with its fifty-four affiliated locals, has pledged its moral and financial support to the printers of that city in the fight that is being made on them by the citizens' alliance in an endeavor to force a return to the nine-hour day.

WRITE a letter to that country printer friend of yours. Send him some literature on the value of affiliation with the International Typographical Union. You may be able to interest him where others would fail. Get him into the ranks, and you will have done your duty as a good union man.

SOME of the book and job proprietors assert that they will shut down and dismantle their plants rather than submit to the eight-hour workday. They say the advance in cost of production of at least 20 per cent will ruin them. And they have found some very ingenious ways of figuring out this predicted 20 per cent increase. Figures may not lie, but at times "they be mighty deceivin'." Grant that the shorter workday would mean an increase in the cost of production, did it ever occur to these proprietors that the cost has been increased many times and to a greater extent by the printers' supply companies? The cost of type, paper, ink and other materials has been increased more than 20 per cent at times. And these employers did not go out of business. And they never held mass meetings and declared their intention of "running their own business" regardless of the material people. No, they paid their bills, knowing that their competitors were paying the same prices. And they did not get any better materials at the advanced price. Under the eight-hour day they will get better service.

THE Los Angeles Examiner has placed an order for a new sextuple press, capable of producing nearly 100,000 twelve-page papers per hour. The press will probably be ready by next September. It was thought when the original equipment of the Examiner was installed that it would be ample for years to come, but the wonderful growth of this sturdy defender of the rights of labor has surprised even the owner of the paper. In this connection it may be of interest to know that the Examiner gained fifty-six columns of advertising in the month of May over the preceding month, while it is said the Times lost 524 columns.

THE STICK, the little journal of typeart published by Louis F. Fuchs, of St. Louis, continues to grow better with each succeeding number. Aside from the excellent specimens of ad composition that are the especial features of the magazine, the good trade union matter it contains is worthy the perusal of all.

THE stone masons employed on the new government building at Indianapolis recently went on strike because two non-unionists were employed. The strike lasted just one hour. The non-unionists were discharged. The union men went back to work. Result: The union shop. See the point.

The Chicago Eight-Hour Conference.

The second annual eight-hour conference of the Central District Printers' Association was held in the city of Chicago on June 9 and 10. Delegates were present from Chicago, Cincinnati, Grand Rapids, Battle Creek, Toledo, South Bend, Kalamazoo, Milwaukee, Des Moines, Rockford, Springfield, Terre Haute, Elkhart, Decatur, Omaha, Indianapolis, Peoria and Niles. The meeting was called to order at 10 o'clock on Friday morning, June 9, by President E. R. Wright, of Chicago. After a few words of welcome by President Wright, the usual order was suspended, and President Lynch, who had just come from St. Louis, spoke of the action of that union in signing a three-year nine-hour contract with the St. Louis Typothetæ. At the conclusion of his remarks a resolution was unanimously passed to send a telegram from the conference to the St. Louis Union, protesting against the action taken by that body. Telegrams were also sent by the individual delegates to the president of St. Louis Union, protesting in the names of the unions represented. After appointing a committee to draft resolutions expressive of the sentiment of the conference on the eight-hour question, the conference adjourned for the morning.

Immediately on reconvening for the afternoon session reports of the various unions represented were taken up. These reports showed an enthusiastic eight-hour sentiment to prevail in the various cities. Plans of campaign were set forth, and many effective ways of organizing non-unionists were explained. President Lynch, being called on for a few remarks, gave a general outline of the work throughout the country, and said the eight-hour sentiment was increasing.

The session on Saturday was devoted to the drafting of a report on the St. Louis incident. This report gave a brief history of the eight-hour movement from its inception, described the various stages and developments of the shorter workday campaign, detailed the manner in which St. Louis had been a participant in the several conferences looking to the establishment of a district conference, reviewed the recent action of No. 8 in signing a nine-hour contract, and closed by declaring confidence in the executive council in its stand on the question. It was declared that while the incident was deplorable, yet it would be productive of good in the end.

The report of the committee on shorter workday was then introduced. It follows:

Whereas, The International Typographical Union at its St. Louis convention decided to inaugurate the eight-hour workday in the book and job offices throughout its jurisdiction on January 1, 1906, peaceably and in conjunction with the United Typothetæ of America if possible; and,

Whereas, The action of the St. Louis convention has been met by the United Typothetæ with threats of war and an endeavor to bring other issues than the eight-hour day into the controversy, and a positive refusal to enter into conference with the International Typographical Union officers for an amicable adjustment of differences; and,

Whereas, The delegates to this Central District Printers' Association, believing that the eight-hour day is the logical workday, and that the rapidly increasing use of labor-saving machinery, in the benefits of which we declare our rights to share, has made this the proper time for its inauguration, and insisting that the eight-hour day is the paramount issue; therefore, be it

Resolved, That we heartily endorse the action of the St. Louis convention in its effort to bring about the shorter workday, and congratulate the International Typographical Union on the results which have already been obtained by that action; that we request the executive council of the International Typographical Union to make another effort for a conference with the United Typothetæ of America for the peaceful settlement of the eight-hour question; and be it further

Resolved, That, realizing that one of the greatest essentials of such a movement is a thorough organization, the delegates of this Central District Printers' Association pledge themselves to return to their locals and use their further efforts to bring about such a system of organization as will on January 1, 1906, make every person working at the printing trades in their vicinity a union man or woman, and thus present a solid phalanx for an eight-hour day on January 1, 1906.

After the election of officers, which resulted in the selection of E. R. Wright, of Chicago, as president, and Frank Kochman, of Cincinnati, as secretary, the city of Terre Haute, Ind., was selected as the next place of meeting, in June, 1906. A motion prevailed that 15,000 copies of the proceedings of the conference be printed and distributed throughout the jurisdiction of the International Typographical Union. A vote of thanks was given Chicago Union No. 16 for the splendid manner in which it had entertained the conference, after which the body adjourned.

On Saturday evening a smoker was given by Chicago Union in honor of the visiting delegates. President Lynch and Secretary Bramwood delivered addresses, and the entertainment features were enjoyed by a large audience.

Other Eight-Hour Meetings.

President Lynch attended the regular meeting of St. Paul (Minn.) Union No. 30 on Sunday, June 4, and addressed that body on the eight-hour question. Next day he addressed an audience of 375 Minneapoolis printers in Union Temple. Others who spoke at this meeting were former President J. P. Kennedy, of Minneapolis Union; Vice-President J. L. Chapman; Organizer J. W. Devereau, of St. Paul; President J. W. Thomas, of St. Paul Union; Charles Greenwood and Secretary N. C. O'Connor. It is the purpose to unite the unions of both cities in their work in the interest of the eight-hour movement, and this will probably be done. More attention can thus be given to the work of organization in the country districts.

On Thursday, June 15, a conference of the eight-hour committees of Connecticut and southern Massachusetts was held at Hartford. Delegates were present from a number of the towns in the district. A number of interesting and inspiring addresses were made, and strong resolutions were adopted setting forth the position of the unions represented as standing firm for the shorter workday and insisting that the typothetæ grant a conference on the subject. The Hartford eight-hour conference is fully covered in the correspondence department.

At Atlanta, Ga., on August 28, will be held the second eight-hour mass meeting of the southeastern eight-hour convention, which was organized at Charlotte, N. C., on May 20. The following states comprise the jurisdiction of the convention: Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Tennessee and Kentucky. Reduced rates have been secured on all railroads entering Atlanta. This organization is doing good work for the eight-hour day. Unions sending delegates are requested to notify John J. Williams, secretary-treasurer, Charlotte, N. C., at least one week before the meeting.

Syracuse Typographical Union No. 55 has issued circulars to the eight-hour committees of other unions in New York state, asking them to consider the advisability of sending delegates to an eight-hour rally in Syracuse in the month of September.

The second annual meeting of the Allied Printing Trades League of Iowa was held in Council Bluffs on May 11. The association was shown to be in splendid shape, and preparations were made to take up eight-hour agitation in every part of the state.

Two thousand people were present at the "eight-hour smoker" given by Atlanta Typographical Union No. 48 on the evening of June 22, in compliment to the Georgia Federation of Labor. From all accounts it was the greatest trade union demonstration ever held in the southeast. Addresses were delivered by many prominent citizens of Atlanta, including the mayor of the city. Many men prominent in trade union affairs also spoke, and eight-hour enthusiasm was rife. The Georgia Federation of Labor assured the printers of its financial as well as moral assistance in the eight-hour fight. A detailed account of this monster meeting will be found in the Atlanta correspondence of this issue.

The Illinois Allied Printing Crafts Union met in its thirteenth annual session at Peoria on June 21. The eight-hour day was the principal topic for discussion, and great enthusiasm was shown in the addresses and resolutions. Organizer Colbert was present and addressed the meeting as a representative of the International Union. The officers elected were: President, W. W. Clarke, Chicago; vice-president, Walter S. Bush, Peoria; secretary and treasurer, John A. Onyun, for the fourteenth time. The delegates to the state convention of the federation of labor are Samuel Olson, Chicago; W. F. Stolz, Champaign; L. L. Underwood, Decatur. William Holzschuh, of Peoria, was named as sergeant-at-arms.

The Press of San Francisco on the Eight-Hour Day.

The six daily papers of San Francisco—the Bulletin, Examiner, Chronicle, Call, Evening Post and Daily News—have taken up the union printers' fight for the continuance of the eight-hour day, and are devoting a great deal of space, both in their news and editorial columns, to a defense of the shorter workday now in force in San Francisco. The fact that the city mentioned has been working successfully under the eight-hour day for some time has been a thorn in the side of the United Typothetæ of America. That association is resisting the efforts of the typographical union to establish the decent workday in all parts of the country, and in order to appear consistent the employers' organization must make a show of wanting to return to longer hours in San Francisco.

It is rather remarkable and unprecedented for every one of the daily papers in a city the size of San Francisco to take the side of the unionists in a controversy. Will J. French, president of San Francisco Union, discusses in the Labor Clarion the ridiculous open letters of the local typothetæ, mention of which is made in another column of THE JOURNAL, and concludes a splendid article by saying:

To get back to first principles: the eight-hour day has proved successful in other lines of business; it has not received a fair and impartial trial in printing circles in San Francisco; public opinion is unanimous on the side of the men, and it is to be sincerely hoped that trade relations will not be disturbed—that the harmonious relations existing between the actual employers and their employes may be continued.

THE JOURNAL would like to reproduce the editorials of the San Francisco papers in their entirety, but this is out of the question. The following brief extracts will give an idea of the general sentiment of the utterances of the Golden Gate newspapers:

The eight-hour day among the printing trades in San Francisco has been approached by gradual stages. At the suggestion of the employing printers themselves it was agreed upon two years and a half ago, the working day being lessened by fifteen minutes each six months. Now that the eight-hour day has been established fully for only five months the employers wish to break their bargain and go back at a bound to a nine-hour day. The pretext under which this increase of service is demanded is that some of the employers do not find that they make as much money under the eight-hour day as they think they would make if the men would work nine hours. Now the Examiner knows something about this part of the question. It is a big employer and has more men than any of the other printing shops of town, and it heartily endorses the eight-hour day. It is confident that it gets more and better service under the shorter day than it would under the nine-hour day.—Examiner.

Just when trade conditions of San Francisco are settling down to peace, when prosperity is enjoyed by the whole community and when everybody is happy in the hope that no more labor disturbances were contemplated, the employing printers come along and plan to upset the whole arrangement. The book and job printing firms—the typothetæ—are now trying to squirm out of an agreement which they themselves made and urged upon the local typographical union. The employers gave the employes an eight-hour day and $20 a week. Now the firms ask the printers to go back to nine hours at the same wage. There appears to be little argument in favor of their contention. The eight-hour day has prevailed in the newspaper offices for a long time. The proprietors believe in the eight-hour rule, and there is now no reason to change it to accommodate the typothetæ. As the real purpose and benefits of organized labor are better understood, no employer would deny that an eight-hour day for the employe with his heart in his work is more valuable than the nine-hour day for the man who works against his will. Industrial conditions in this city are not torn up; we have now no strikes or lockouts. Why change all this? The whole community suffers every time a labor clash occurs. Do the employing printers want to enforce the open shop issue? Do they want to involve hundreds and perhaps thousands in a useless conflict? They say not. Then why should not they live up to the terms which they were so eager to make two years ago? The employing printers, should they carry out their threats to force the issue July 1, should have no encouragement from the public and no sympathy from the people who work for a living and who know that eight hours for labor, eight hours for sleep and eight hours for study and recreation have been accepted by all labor as equitable and can not and should not be changed to suit the employers of printers. The Daily News, in its humble way and with all its strength, shall always be found on the side of the men who labor when those men are in the right; when they are in the wrong it will endeavor to point the way, that the whole people may not suffer from misdirected efforts.—Daily News.

Long experience has proved that a man will labor eight hours with less fatigue than if he labors nine hours; that ought to be a self-evident proposition. If he has been deprived of his privilege of working only eight hours and is compelled to work for the same wages during nine hours he will not turn out the same amount of work in nine hours that he formerly accomplished in eight hours. These are the statistics of labor throughout the world. Nothing is gained and much may be lost by this forcing process, especially if the laborer has enjoyed other and more salutary conditions. He naturally objects to giving his employer that extra hour, on the principle that it is part of his only capital. He would not think of asking his employer to give him money without adequate return; and he would not think of compelling that employer to give him anything on any terms if the employer did not want to sell it. Even if the employer in this instance is willing to pay for nine hours' labor the employed is not, in justice, compelled to sell more of those hours than he sees fit. If he has agreed to sell eight hours of his labor he should not be forced to sell nine hours.—Evening Post.

Aside from the merits of the particular case, which advantage is plainly on the side of the men, the eight-hour day should be preserved. Shorter hours are a part of the higher civilization to which the world looks forward. In this particular line of progress the printers are ahead of most of their fellows. Members of eighty-two of the subordinate bodies of the International Typographical Union already have the eight-hour day, and forty-eight other unions have made arrangements for its introduction in the near future. San Francisco, it is true, is the largest of the cities in the long list, but other great cities will soon wheel into line. To go back to nine hours here would retard a great movement that makes for the betterment of mankind. San Francisco should not countenance such a backward step. Press and public should take the side of the printers. Their cause is just, and they are fighting this battle, not only for themselves, but for all the craftsmen who look forward to shorter hours.—Bulletin.

It is conceded by economists that the former long day for labor, by which we do not mean the nine-hour day merely, but the much longer day which preceded it, caused a limitation of output through its moral and physical injury to workingmen. The long day by no means meant a long output, nor did it mean the highest excellence of the product. As the day was shortened a distinct economic gain appeared and, of more importance, there was a gain in the physique and the morale of labor. We believe there is no dispute of these results of a shorter day. All systems go to judgment on their results, their effect upon the welfare of man. Hence it is that the short day is affirmed and that it has come to stay. Between it and the long day there is a flexible space, a ground for discussion and compromise, at piece work, in such trades as can be subjected to that plan, but that need not be discussed here.—Call.

If a printer employs a carpenter to build or repair his house, he will get only an eight-hour day for the wages he pays. This runs through all the industries in this city with which the individual citizen usually has dealings. Prices and business generally have become, or are becoming adjusted to this situation. The public generally has become converted to the principle of paying wages which will support a family in reasonable comfort, and of being satisfied with hours which give the employe some free time which he can spend wisely if he will. Under these conditions the city is more prosperous than ever before in its history. If increased wages to artisans involve higher prices for their products the public generally seems willing to assume the burden. We are convinced that our employing printers can sell their output at prices which will warrant the continuation of present conditions.—Chronicle.

These papers know what they are talking about. All of them have had actual experience as employers of labor. Opinions of this character and support from such sources will have weight with the thinking book and job employer.

According to authentic reports from San Francisco the movement to gradually introduce the eight-hour day was inaugurated two and a half years ago as the result of a compromise proposition submitted by the employing book and job printers to meet the request of the union for an immediate increase in the wage schedule. The agreement finally reached provided also for a gradual increase in wages. For the past six months all union shops have been working eight hours.

The executive council of the International Typographical Union has assured San Francisco Union No. 21 of financial support in resisting the efforts of the employers to reinstate the nine-hour day.

"Independent" Operator's Blunder.

On June 3 a non-union telegraph operator at the New Orleans cotton exchange made a mistake of three points in giving the government crop condition estimate. The report was posted in the shape it came from the operator. Prices shot skyward. In a few moments the error was discovered, but in that short time thousands of dollars were lost by speculators. One broker lost $15,000 in exactly twenty-five seconds through the error.

President Brittan, of the exchange, said in regard to the costly blunder: "This is the result of Western Union cheap labor." He called the exchange to order in the midst of the excitement and said that the error in sending the wrong figures by the Western Union Telegraph Company was an unmitigated crime. "As president of this exchange, I assure you the directors and I will do all we can to ferret out and punish the perpetrators."

Secretary Hester said the Western Union "should have had a first-class, competent man to take information of such vast importance, the result of which caused serious fluctuations in the market."

The officers of the exchange wired the Western Union Company that the telegraph company would be held responsible for the error.

Another case of the "independent" workman not panning out very well.

Boston Employing Printers' Meeting.

On Tuesday, May 24, employing book and job printers of New England met in Faneuil hall, Boston, and expressed themselves, by speech and resolution, as determined to oppose the inauguration of the eight-hour day by the International Typographical Union. It was resolved, by a rising vote, "under no circumstances" to submit to the proposed shorter workday. The meeting was held at the invitation of the Boston typothetæ. There were employers present from Maine, Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Connecticut. J. Stearns Cushing, president of the Boston typothetæ, was chairman of the meeting, and officers of the United Typothetæ were present. In his opening address Mr. Cushing called attention to the fact (?) that if the eight-hour day was instituted much of the money spent by American publishing houses would go abroad. George H. Ellis, of Boston, president of the United Typothetæ of America, told of the meetings of employers he had been attending in the central west and south. According to press reports, he said in part: "Personally, I hope for the time when all trades will work only eight hours, but that time has not yet arrived. This movement does not come from the members of the unions. It originates with the leaders, who must do something to justify them in seeking to keep the positions they occupy." The resolutions adopted were of the usual type, only a little more so. They declare that the "proposed reduction of hours is not required for the physical comfort, moral, mental or religious improvement of the people whom it is thought to affect thereby." Quite a bitter discussion took place when Henry Sterling, secretary of Boston Typographical Union, asked permission to sit in the convention. George H. Ellis started the debate by incorporating Mr. Sterling's request in a motion that he be invited to take a seat in the hall. He said: "As we stand, as in the case of war, facing the enemy, I move that we say: 'Come in.' We have nothing to hide." Hardly had Mr. Ellis ceased when half a dozen members of the convention were fighting for the floor to oppose the motion. James Berwick, of Norwood, secured recognition and said: "This is a discussion among ourselves. This gentleman comes from the camp of the enemy. He has no place with us here." Mr. Sweeney, of Cliftondale, said: "I do not think it justice to ourselves to allow the representative of a trade union paper to hear what we have to say. I don't think we ought to let all the world know what we are going to do." Mr. Ellis replied that the convention had not gone into executive session, and there was therefore no reason to exclude reporters. "I favor admitting Mr. Sterling," he said, "because I know what I think and am not afraid to say it to any one." Mr. Wood, of Boston, said: "Mr. Sterling represents those who have us by the throats." After more or less bitter debate, the motion was finally put to a vote and lost. Then the speechmaking was resumed. F. A. Kendrick, of Buffalo, classed the eight-hour movement as "the reptile which has reared its head in our midst." Isaac H. Blanchard, of the Blanchard Press, New York City, is quoted by the press as follows: "A gentleman named Lynch now sits down at his desk, picks up a pen and writes: 'On such a day you must stand and deliver.' The only thing to do with this sort of a Dick Turpin is to—(and the speaker made an expressive gesture)."

And there was a great deal more of the same sort of talk.

Convention Arrangements.

RAILWAY RATES.

Secretary-Treasurer Bramwood has completed arrangements for a special railroad rate of one and one-third fare for the round trip, on the certificate plan, for the delegates and visitors attending the Toronto convention. The passenger associations joining in the special rate are:

The New England Passenger Association—Territory, east of New York state and Lake Champlain.

Central Passenger Association—Territory, from Buffalo, Pittsburg and Parkersburg, W. Va., on the east, to Chicago and St. Louis on the west.

Western Passenger Association—Territory, west of Chicago and St. Louis, except Texas, Indian and Oklahoma territories and southern Missouri.

Southeastern Passenger Association—Territory, south of the Ohio and Potomac and east of the Mississippi.

Southwestern Passenger Bureau — Territory, Texas, Indian and Oklahoma territories and southern Missouri.

Trunk Line Association—Territory, from Niagara Falls, Buffalo, Dunkirk and Salamanca, N. Y.; Erie and Pittsburg, Pa.; Bellaire, Ohio; Wheeling, Parkersburg and Huntington, W. Va., and points east thereof, except New England.

Eastern Canadian Passenger Association—Stations in Canada east of and including Port Arthur, Sault Ste. Marie and the St. Clair and Detroit rivers; also Detroit, Port Huron, and Sault Ste. Marie, Mich; Buffalo, Black Rock, Niagara Falls, Suspension Bridge, Rouses Point, Fort Covington, Bombay, Helena and Massina Springs, N. Y.; Swanton and Newport, Vt.

By a perusal of the foregoing list, delegates and visitors will be enabled to locate the association under the jurisdiction of which they are situated. Where doubt exists inquiry should be made of the local ticket agent. Especial attention is directed to certain rules of the associations granting the rate, to wit:

Delegates and others availing of this reduction in fare must present themselves at the ticket offices for certificates and tickets at least thirty minutes before departure of trains.

The holder of each certificate will be required to pay a fee of 25 cents for the viseing of his certificate by the special railroad agent at Toronto.

Persons who do not hold certificates will not be entitled to the special rate.

Each person going to Toronto, in order to get the special rate, must pay full fare en route to the convention, and at the time of purchasing the ticket to the place of meeting must procure, from the agent of whom such ticket is purchased, a certificate indicating that full fare has been paid for the going passage, and the route by which the return passage will be made. It is absolutely necessary that these certificates should be obtained.

If a through ticket can not be procured at the starting point, the person should purchase to the most convenient point at which such ticket can be obtained, and there purchase through to the place of meeting, procuring a standard certificate from each agent from whom a ticket is purchased.

No certificate will be honored that was procured more than three days (Sunday not included) before the meeting assembles (except that when meetings are held at distant points, to which the authorized transit limit is more than three days, the authorized transit limit will govern), nor more than two days (Sunday not included) after the first day of the meeting. No certificate will be honored for return ticket unless presented during the time that the meeting is in session, or within three days (Sunday not included) after adjournment. The convention opens on Monday, August 14.

The certificate obtained at time of purchasing the ticket for the passage to Toronto must be placed in the hands of the secretary-treasurer on arrival in the convention city. When properly signed by the secretary-treasurer and the special agent of the passenger association, and the viseing fee of 25 cents paid, it will be returned to its owner, and, on presentation to the railroad officials in Toronto, will entitle the holder to a continuous return passage, at one-third fare, by the same route followed en route to the convention. Neither the certificates on which the return tickets are issued nor the tickets are transferable, and if found in the possession of any one to whom they do not properly belong are null and void. Delegates and visitors should bear in mind this fact and act accordingly. Any attempt to escape the rules will result in the loss of the rate and necessitate the payment of full fare by the persons violating the regulations.

The special rate is contingent upon there being in attendance at the convention 100 or more persons holding certificates showing the purchase of a ticket to the convention city. Delegates and visitors availing themselves of this rate are urged to get the proper certificate when purchasing tickets to Toronto.

Delegates and other members who contemplate visiting the convention have only to observe the directions given in this article to take advantage of this privilege. Delegates and visitors are at liberty to select their route, suiting their own time and convenience, our negotiations having been made with the various associations rather than with any particular line. We are also informed that instructions have been issued to the various local ticket agents, who will gladly furnish such information as is at their disposal.

HEADQUARTERS, ETC.

The Rossin House has been selected as the headquarters hotel. Delegates stopping there can obtain accommodations on the American plan at $2.50 per day per head, single, $2 per day double, without bath; rooms with bath will be 50 cents per day per person extra. The European plan rate is $1 per day and upward, without bath; $2 single and $3 double, with bath.

The sessions of the convention will be held in the Labor Temple. This building is only a short distance from the Rossin House, and is convenient to all other hotels.

TORONTO'S PROGRAM.

Secretary Chinn, of the committee on arrangements of Toronto Typographical Union No. 91, reports that the committee has about completed its plans for the entertainment of visitors during the coming convention, to be held in August. What the committee proposes to do is told by Mr. Chinn in the Toronto letter in this issue of THE JOURNAL. It is understood that a circular covering this matter will be sent all delegates by the committee, as soon as all its arrangements have been perfected. Get in early and be sure not to miss any of the fun.

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO LAWS.

The committee on laws, which is required by our constitution to pass upon all amendments prior to action by the convention, will meet in Toronto three days before the opening of the session. Members having amendments to our laws which they wish to present, should forward them in duplicate to Secretary-Treasurer Bramwood at once. They will be given to the law committee promptly upon its convening. This will insure early action upon all propositions and materially facilitate the work of the committee.

DEPOSIT YOUR CREDENTIALS.

All delegates are urged to deposit their credentials with Secretary-Treasurer Bramwood, as soon as possible after reaching Toronto. A compliance with this request will facilitate the work of the secretary-treasurer in making up the roll call and also permit of each delegate's name being considered by the president in the appointment of committees. This is important. Don't forget it.

BE SURE YOUR UNION IS IN GOOD STANDING.

Our laws require all the indebtedness of a local union to be paid up to and including the month of June in order that its delegate may participate in the business of the convention. Delegates will save themselves annoyance by being sure that their locals have fully complied with the law, before leaving for Toronto.

The London Society of Compositors.

The latest report of the above-named union, a copy of which has been received through the courtesy of C. W. Bowerman, the secretary, shows that it is in a flourishing condition. The society, which has 11,295 members, is worth £68,927, which includes its freehold property known as the society house. It has assets of £52,072, and its liabilities, at £4 per member, total £45,180, an excess of assets of £6,892. It paid out in the first quarter of this year £1,637 for superannuation allowances, £3,378 for out-of-work allowances, and £87 for strike benefits. The society has over £740 credited to its parliamentary representation fund. As usual, the report gives a full list of the members who received out-of-work and other benefits from the society, so that all members know where their money goes. The report states that Ruskin College, the labor college at Oxford University, has purchased a new site, on which there are three houses, and as soon as sufficient funds are in hand the necessary alterations will be begun. The college offers to any worker in the trade union movement an opportunity for a thorough education in those questions which the movement has to decide, and at very cheap rates. The parliamentary committee of the trades union congress appeals to the unions of Great Britain for support of the college. The society has apportioned the sum of £319 among the various hospitals and dispensaries of London for the current year. The parliamentary representative committee reports that it is satisfied with the outlook for the candidate for the house of commons, who happens to be Mr. Bowerman. The committee strenuously advocates the claims of labor for greater parliamentary representation. The result of the borough council election, where all the labor candidates were elected, may be taken as showing the labor party in the London district to be of considerable strength, and capable of giving a good account of itself at the next general election. It is believed that ere long labor will have an independent organ of its own, pledged to voice the aspirations of the industrial community.

The Philadelphia Employers' Meeting.

Employing book and job printers of the middle states district of the United Typothetæ of America held a "mass" meeting in Philadelphia, Pa., on Wednesday, June 21. Employers were present from the various cities in the district and the national officers of the typothetæ were on hand as usual. Lawrence Fell, of the Philadelphia typothetæ, presided, and in his opening address made the statement that the shorter workday would entail an added cost of 22 per cent. George Ellis, president of the United Typothetæ, who followed, according to the press reports, "branded as false the statement, sedulously circulated by the International Typographical Union, that the typothetæ had refused overtures toward an amicable adjustment of the point at issue." He further stated that although he thought the rank and file of the union wanted the eight-hour day, he did not believe they would fight for it. E. A. Kendrick, of Buffalo, made the startling assertion that the employers in San Francisco had gone back to the nine-hour day. This bit of "news" was wildly applauded. An attempt was made by Edward H. Bailey, of the Johnstown Daily Democrat, to have the conference adopt resolutions condemning the paper trust, which he said affected the employer more than the eight-hour day. The motion was defeated. Edward Meyers, of the Co-Operative Press of New York, took the floor in opposition to the nine-hour resolutions, which were sprung about this time. He was continually interrupted by jeers, but continued his speech unconcerned each time order was restored by the chairman. "I can only say, for my firm, which has prospered under an eight-hour agreement," said the speaker, "that we shall assist the International Typographical Union in every way possible in its fight for the eight-hour day, which is sure to come, whether you defeat the International Union or not." E. M. Watson, of Jersey City, said: "We want to get some ginger in us, so that we shall feel that we are opposed to anything the International Union is in favor of and in favor of anything that the International Union is opposed to." Everett Waddy, of Richmond, said: "I would welcome a national strike on January 1." Then Edward H. Bailey again brought up the paper question, declaring it was of more importance than the eight-hour movement. The usual resolutions were adopted declaring the body to be "unalterably opposed" to the eight-hour day.

Agitate, organize.

Another Cruel Blow.

The typothetæ has been trying to get up a flirtation with the proprietors of the Crooksville (Ohio) Advance. The result of their overtures may be seen in the following item clipped from the Advance:

The Advance has received several communications from the secretary of the United Typothetæ of America (the employers' organization) asking us what we are going to do to prevent the adoption of the eight-hour day, as advocated by the International Typographical Union, to take effect January 1, 1906.

We have made no reply to these requests, for the reason that we do not feel called upon to do anything. The eight-hour day is already in operation in most of the larger printing establishments in the United States, and its universal adoption is only a question of time, and might as well come January 1, 1906, as any other date.

Employers are blind to the logic of events and fail to read history understandingly if they imagine they can prevent the general adoption of the eight-hour day. They may possibly delay its coming in some industries for a little time yet, but they will ultimately have to accept the inevitable—the eight-hour day comes in the natural course of social and industrial evolution, and all opposition must necessarily give way before it.

The employers, years ago, fought the twelve-hour day, the ten-hour and nine-hour day, and now they are putting up the same losing fight against the eight-hour day.

The shorter day belongs to the workers as a matter of right. By the use of modern labor-saving machinery the ability of the workers to produce has been wonderfully increased, and one of the benefits that should of right accrue to them is the shortening of the workday.

No, we are not going to do anything to retard the coming of the eight-hour day. We couldn't if we should try, and we are not foolish enough to try.

We commend this to the careful consideration of Secretary Macintyre. It affords a basis for another interrogation point circular.

Twenty-Five Per Cent This Time.

The latest figure for the loss to the book and job proprietor under the eight-hour day comes from San Francisco. The employers out there have been handled pretty severely by the newspapers on account of their unreasonable opposition to the continuance of the shorter workday, and as a consequence the San Francisco Typothetæ has been requesting the local papers to publish a long communication from the association, which they say gives the "true facts in the case." This communication, after a rambling discussion of the competition of Boston and Albany firms, on account of the longer workday in those far eastern cities, makes the rather surprising statement:

If the merchants of San Francisco were willing to pay about 25 per cent more for their printing than formerly, in order to overcome the increased cost, the matter could easily be adjusted by continuing the eight-hour day, but they are not willing to do this, and as a result thousands of dollars are sent east each month for printing which should be kept in San Francisco.

The difference between eight and nine hours would mean an increase of 25 per cent in the cost of production! Think it over.

MANY a man who imagines he could run the earth can't even manage a small garden successfully.—Ex.

"What Is It?"

One of the latest question-mark circulars from the prolific pen of John Macintyre, the United Typothetæ secretary, asks the recipient a lot of irrelevant questions that are evidently intended to bring him into the fold in short order. This frantic appeal starts off with the following scarehead: "The United Typothetæ of America—What Is It?" We confess this is rather a hard one—about the hardest conundrum Mr. Macintyre has yet propounded. But it is immediately made clear, for the secretary quotes at length from the constitution and by-laws of the august body he represents, and by way of explanation adds that the organization is "based on the right of the individual as opposed to the arrogated rights of trade societies, and while it disclaims any intent to assume an arbitrary control of the trade, either against customers, workmen or members, as an organization it asserts and will maintain the right to regulate its own affairs."

THE JOURNAL is entirely in accord with the latter assertion—that the organization should maintain the right to regulate its own affairs. We hope it will continue to regulate its own affairs, which is only another way of saying that the association maintains the right to mind its own business.

The next question to startle the reader of this circular is: "Of What Is It Composed?" Here is where you get a surprise. Mr. Macintyre says it is composed of employing printers. Who would ever have guessed it? The gentleman has evidently thrown discretion to the winds, and is proceeding to lay bare the secrets of his organization in a reckless manner.

"How to Join" is told by means of blanks to be filled out and sent back to John Macintyre—with $10.

"How Governed" is told in a few words. This paragraph deals mainly with the manner of electing officers, and provides for the salary of the secretary—John Macintyre.

"What It Offers to Its Members" is the next scarehead. Under this heading is outlined the system of strike benefits which the typothetæ pays to those of its members who are unfortunate enough to have their offices

"struck." This scheme is obviously patterned in some respects after the plan of the International Typographical Union, as it provides for the submission of the grievance of the "struck" member to the executive board for approval.

The circular closes with a list of questions to which Mr. Macintyre can hardly hope to obtain satisfactory answers. One of these follows: "This (the eight-hour day) means an increase in cost of production of nearly 20 per cent. Do you imagine that you can advance your charges to your customers sufficiently to cover that increase?" The national typothetæ's secretary should get together with some of the local officers and members of his organization, and agree on some figure for this predicted loss. A number of typothetæ circulars have been received by THE JOURNAL, and no two of them agree in this respect—the claims varying from 10 to 30 per cent, with the poorhouse in sight, according to the chairman of the national executive committee of the organization.

Again we call Mr. Macintyre's attention to the "What We Are Doing" columns of THE JOURNAL.

Plagiarism by Labor Editors.

Attention is called to the following article from the Michigan Labor Advocate, headed "A Higher Standard of Professional Honor Among Editors":

Specifically we refer to the practice of piracy by a large percentage of labor editors.

One feels rather delicate and almost guilty in broaching the subject, and we would hold our peace were we not ready to gamble that the editor who is now reading this editorial has experienced the unchristian-like mixture of satisfaction and exasperated anger at seeing some pet article on which he had expended hours of hard work serenely riding (head and all) on the front page of his "brother editor's" next issue with no credit given.

A large number of labor editors follow continuously a practice of stealing their material, a thing which no reputable newspaper man would stoop to do. The matter of news is not of so great importance, but when it comes to the editorial columns and the feature articles it's time to be decent.

The subject is more far-reaching than occurs to one at first thought. Not only does the man who follows "swiping" persistently dull his sense of honor and rob another man of the credit due him, but he wrongs himself most. He kills his own initiative and originality. He becomes an intellectual dependent—a parasite. His paper loses tone, coherence, vim—and personality. The practice boosts him along the way toward failure.

There are two reasons why this practice obtains. Lack of time and lack of brains. For the first we have some sympathy. It's a hard job to be the whole works, but if a man lacks time and wants to use a brother editor's stuff let him be honest. For the second there is no excuse. Get out of the business.

We believe it is of vital interest to the labor press to have this practice abolished. It may be a hard job, but we are ready to do our share of fighting it—and are going to. Please note that, some of you!

THE JOURNAL believes it also has room for an emphatic protest on this subject. The editor of THE JOURNAL has been patient and long suffering, but there is a limit to all things. A copy of the Blacksmiths' Journal for June just came to hand, and we find that almost seven columns of that publication are composed of extracts from our journal—some used as editorial matter in that magazine—and not a credit given in a single instance. We don't want to appear stingy, and are always glad to see our matter used—with credit given. It is also rather annoying to come across an original JOURNAL article credited to some other publication, having been clipped from that publication under the impression that it was original with the pirate. THE JOURNAL believes it would be a good plan for the editors of all reputable labor papers to keep account of the instances of journalistic piracy coming to their notice, and publish in each issue a list of the offending papers. THE JOURNAL intends to do this hereafter.

Ready to Help Us.

At the convention of the Minnesota Blue Label League, held at Brainerd recently, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the Minnesota State Blue Label League, in convention assembled, does hereby endorse the action of the International Typographical Union in its effort to secure the eight-hour day for the book and job printers on Monday, January 1, 1906, and pledge ourselves to an assessment in case it is necessary to assist the members of the International Typographical Union in Minnesota.

BE sure you are right—then, instead of sitting down and thinking it over—go ahead!—Ex.

Effect of the Open Shop on Business.

Because of the fact that the town of Battle Creek, Mich., has been selected by the various union-hating associations as a place to try the open shop scheme, that little city has been attracting a great deal of attention of late. In last month's JOURNAL an account was given of industrial conditions there. Below we present a copy of a circular that has just been issued by the independent business men of that city. They have taken up the task of ridding the town of the business wreckers. It is to be hoped that this may prove to be the beginning of an association, national in scope, which will forever put a quietus on the un-American schemes of the Grapenuts Post type of "business men."

TO THE CITIZENS OF BATTLE CREEK.

At an informal meeting of independent business men, who are not connected with the Business Men's Association or Post Alliance, a Merchants' Protective League was organized. The action of C. W. Post in again inserting uncalled-for attacks on organized labor, in the local press, was discussed and heartily condemned. It was decided that if they were continued, the league would consider it to be their duty to call a mass meeting of all the citizens of Battle Creek to emphatically repudiate the action of Post, which has placed our city in such an unfavorable light with the outside world, and by antagonizing the workingmen, who now spend a large part of their earnings in neighboring cities, helped to cause the great financial depression that is now being felt.

Union men are requested to refrain from taking any notice of these insults and are asked to give the preference to home merchants in buying goods when they can procure the union label on the articles they need.

Their attention is called to the fact that one of our most prominent merchants is now advertising union made clothing in spite of the anti-union element.

The great need of patronizing home industries is emphasized by the retiring from business of our largest grocer (if he had received but a portion of the trade that goes to adjacent cities he would now be conducting a flourishing business). The same can be said of two large gents' furnishers, a shoe store, an art store and several other business enterprises which are leaving the city.

Workingmen are particularly requested to remain in the city and others are invited to locate here when business picks up. There are hundreds of empty houses in the city and they will have no trouble finding accommodations, and they will be guaranteed protection from any interference by the Post Alliance with their personal liberty.

The impression that the Business Men's Association wished to set fixed prices and eliminate competition, and that the object of the Post Alliance was low wages and long hours of work, has become so firmly fixed in the minds of the people as to render the existence of these bodies detrimental to the advancement of the best interests of the city, and would seem to make the dissolving of these organizations necessary and the establishment of a local association to transact public business affairs for the benefit of the city at large.

Taking steps for the prosecution of stock promoters, who have swindled the public by selling stock through misrepresentation, was also considered. THE MERCHANTS' PROTECTIVE LEAGUE.

"Individual Liberty" Again.

The attention of THE JOURNAL has been called to an editorial on the eight-hour question, which recently appeared in the Bloomington (Ill.) Pantagraph. The writer, after attempting to set forth the position of the employers in opposition to the shorter workday, says in part:

This eight-hour day is virtually a proposition to take one-fifth of the liberty from the individual man and leave him four-fifths. It is a proposition to let him work for a part of a day and stop short of its completion. It is a proposition to delegate a fifth of his productive energy to oblivion and retain the rest.

To be consistent, this eight-hour proposition should have a proviso that labor should be content to live on four-fifths of its normal comforts and give up the other fifth. Let there be only four-fifths as much food for the family, four-fifths as much clothes, four-fifths as much pleasure, and let the other fifth be sacrificed. Let us have fractional comforts instead of the usual measure—fractional accomplishment, fractional results—an 80 per cent activity with 80 per cent enjoyment. Manhood at a 20 per cent discount. If this is not logical, why not?

The truth is that the able-bodied workman these bright spring mornings, who waits with a watch in his hand for the hour of eight before he will take up his tools, commits a sin against heaven's light and sunshine, against heaven's pure air, and, worse than all, a sin against his own powers and his own opportunities. He mocks at the pulsation of his own energy, and sits down and idles and laughs and waits while destiny invites him on. It is miserable sophistry—that to narrow the powers of one leaves more work for others. The more work the more wealth and the more enjoyment, and the more each individual accomplishes the more opportunity for every other in the long run. This false economy that doubles back upon and dwarfs humanity under the pretense of making more opportunity for others should deceive no longer. The men who have risen in this world from strenuous toil to easier conditions never accepted such philosophy. They closed it with the offer which heaven gave and struck while the iron was hot, nor stopped to look at the watch. They were afraid of doing too little and not too much.

All friends of labor should beware how they put the eight-hour shackles upon free men. For as sure as truth prevails these unnatural fetters will be broken sooner or later by a reliant manhood that will insist upon putting all its normal energy and not a fraction merely into the solution of the problem of existence.

Such striking originality in discussing economic questions will surely be recognized ere long by some of the great city dailies, and the Pantagraph will then lose the services of this genius. The interests of the "public" demand that the valuable effusions of this intellectual giant be not allowed to "blush unseen and waste their sweetness on the desert air."

Another "Confession."

Readers of the daily press will remember seeing in the newspapers last September an account of the arrest of a burglar who confessed that he was one of a squad of members of the Western Federation of Miners which blew up the depot at Independence, Colo., on June 6, 1904, killing thirteen men. This burglar, Robert Romaine by name, has now made another confession in which he admits that his former story was false, and further states that he was hired to tell the lie by Frank Sheafer, an alleged agent of the Cripple Creek Mine Owners' Association. His first "confession" was eagerly seized upon by the newspapers of the country and displayed under big, black scareheads. The second "confession," denying the truth of the first, does not seem to be so attractive. Wonder why.

The "Rev." Phelan's Latest.

The Rev. D. S. Phelan, editor of the Western Watchman, of St. Louis, Mo., has taken up the cause of the "independent workman," and the following from his pen may enable some of our readers to "see where truth is not":

We have a cool and methodical way of declaring war on government and laws in this country. A number of men drop their tools, assemble in a hall and discuss "grievances." When the last man has spoken, the question of a strike is submitted to a vote, and if carried in the affirmative, the presiding officer is empowered to announce to the world that war is on. From that time on, or until the strike is declared off, as it was declared on, and by the same people, the chairman of that strike meeting supplants president, governor, mayor and chief of police; and his "executive orders" take the place of constitutions and laws and ordinances; the old men and their wives, the young men and their sweethearts, the small boy and the smaller girl begin "getting ready;" purchase weapons, arrange hours of duty and "zones of war;" form in platoons on prominent street corners, and drill in parks and public grounds. The public are duly warned of danger in the pursuit of their daily avocations, and all men who, like the three Hebrew children, refuse to obey the orders of the "chairman" are slugged, shot or carved into ribbons, just as they happen to fall into the hands of male or female hyenas. The police are told "to take care," and the officers of the courts are warned that they hold their office by the favor of "the people," and that the "will of the people" is the sovereign law. The streets are deserted; business paralyzed; the inhabitants of the city are thrown into a panic, and unless federal troops soon appear on the scene and Gatling guns lumber along the principal thoroughfares, life and liberty are insecure. The papers talk of peace and compromise; and some of small circulation may even speak about the unwisdom of violence. The mob is only urged on to excess by the rout of the guardians of the law and the exponents of public opinion.

These papers have yet on sale the numbers in which the conduct of the anarchist in Russia was applauded, and the attempts at revolution were defended, on the very principles now invoked by the Chicago strikers. This is getting to be an infernal country, for in it no longer "order" but industrial "horror" reigns. The first duty of a government is to its citizens; and the first right of the citizen is protection; protection of life, liberty and happiness. Our national and state governments protect us when we do not need protection; when we need it they in the most cowardly way abandon us to the mercy of unions.

These men who are setting law at defiance in Chicago should be taught the lesson that their fellows in anarchy have been taught in France, Germany and Belgium. They have not yet learned that strike riots have been eliminated from the program of the unions in those countries. We shall not speak of Russia, for there there may have been some cause for popular violence; but in every country in the world where the people participate in the government, the striker who takes up arms is considered a murderer, or madman, and he is treated as such. We have had all the labor riots in this country we propose to stand; and this reign of terror in Chicago will be a "short, sharp, and," we hope, "a decisive action." Democracy does not mean mob rule; the "government of the people, for the people and by the people" does not mean a "government of unions, for unions and by unions;" and the sooner the latter find that out, the better for all concerned.

We have no faith in the police. The courts are oftentimes secretly in sympathy with the strikers. The militia are often in league with the rioters. The only sure protection of law and order is the presence of regulars. One regiment of artillery rolling along Wabash avenue will bring those howling rioters to their senses. Those ugly-frowning field pieces have no pity on "down-trodden" workmen and "suffering" seamstresses when they treat the public with impromptu showers of brickbats. Those stolid gunners do not look into the faces of the men who are howling in front of them. Cannon balls make a ready passage for people and wagons through obstructed streets, and make the thoughts of the most violent readily turn to home. The day of the riot hero is passed, and the size of the throng no longer relieves its members of the character of rowdies. We are tired of strikes and unions, and closed shops, and workingmen's tyranny; and the sooner the last-named realize that they have reached the dead-line the better.

"The courts are oftentimes secretly in sympathy with the strikers. The militia are often in league with the rioters." That is about the limit. We suppose the gentleman had Colorado in mind when he made the above statements. The editor of the Switchmen's Journal suggests that the "Rev." Phelan has been indulging to excess in postum. Anyhow, he would be a valuable acquisition to the grape-nuts publicity bureau.

THERE is a peculiarity that is noticeable in the editorials of almost all daily papers when they feel called upon to comment on a labor trouble. They generally say something like this: "We care nothing about the merits of the controversy; we do not care which side may be in the right," etc. Right there is where they jump the track. It is with the merits of a controversy that the papers and the public should deal. There is too much of this business of concealing the merits of cases. The real cause of a strike or lockout should be the point on which the light should be shed. You can nearly always conclude that the strike is a just one when the daily press attempts to cover up the cause in this way. If there is no merit in it, you may rest assured that fact will be paraded before the public.

THE Massachusetts state branch of the American Federation of Labor advises union men not to patronize Walter Baker & Co., makers of Baker's cocoa and chocolate. The firm has all its boxes made at the unfair box factory of Atwood Brothers, of Whitman, Mass., and has ignored all requests of labor to either withdraw its work from the unfair firm or to use its influence in adjusting matters.

The Ruin of Cripple Creek.

In last month's JOURNAL appeared an article describing the conditions prevailing in industrial circles in Battle Creek, Mich.—the result of the senseless persecution of unions by the citizens' alliance. The town of Cripple Creek, Colo., has probably had its share of this same sort of union baiting, and the following from the Cripple Creek Forum will give a fair idea of the condition of a town after the citizens' alliance is permitted full sway:

That the general business in the Cripple Creek district is stagnant, and that it is worse than at any time since the strike began two years ago, is beyond dispute. This applies to every branch of trade. It includes the real estate man as well as the merchant. It includes the broker and banker, together with the lawyer and the doctor.

It has become so alarming to men of invested means and the home-owner as to cause debate and serious apprehension among those who have been the most hopeful throughout the long and disastrous struggles between employer and employe.

It is time for us to reason together, and in so doing cast prejudice and politics to the winds. It is a question so serious and so vital to the entire resident population as to demand our best thought, sincerest patriotism and positive concerted action. . . .

The hope of all business in the camp must rest upon the labor in the mines. The certainty of tenure of employment of this labor is the basis of normal successful trade. This certainty has been replaced with absolute uncertainty, until of the many thousands of men employed in the mines scarcely one can rely upon his employment for a day.

By the card system, if he loses his employment in one mine he can have no reasonable hope of employment in another. He has but one of two things to do, and that is to leave the district or starve. In this event, if he owns a home he must abandon it; if he has a family he must take it with him. It is only a more refined system of deportation than by mobs with ropes and guns.

It is astounding that men of wealth and character, supposed to have regard for humanity and decency, should permit a single individual to pass upon the right of each one of nearly five thousand men to obtain employment. And yet this is what the mine owners' association is doing! More astounding still, that that man should be one without education, without property, who does not pay a dollar of tax, suddenly raised from a job-losing, job-hunting creature, wholly irresponsible, to be the dictator of thousands of men, and that as to their very right to have employment. A walking delegate—coarse, brutal and impudent—beside which the walking delegate of the labor union was a prince of the royal blood. A creature who takes away an honest man's card and with it his right to earn a living, with the same kindly sympathy and manly grace with which the jailer of old gouged out the eyes of his prisoner with red-hot irons.

Every man's politics is questioned. Woman spies go about talking to the wives of the miners, and if the politics or religion of the family is not agreeable to the walking delegate, then away goes the card of the husband.

The result of it all is to establish a sort of peonage both disgusting and infamous. This is revolting to every man who has sufficient manhood to lay claim to American citizenship. In his very soul he resents it, and vows he will get away from it as soon as possible. The effect of it is that the very best men and the very best miners are now and have been leaving camp as fast as they can save sufficient to get away comfortably, with their families. From a good customer of the merchant he has become a simple existant until he can regain his freedom. From a home-buyer, with money, he has become a home-seller without a customer. Under this system, if a man owns a home he dare not improve it, and if he does not own he dare not buy one. He rents a furnished house, for he dare not invest in furniture for fear that the very next day he may lose his card and be compelled to sacrifice his investment. The great majority of those working in the mines today are single men, or men whose families are not here.

That more than $100,000 each month goes into money and express orders, to say nothing of bank drafts, is the best evidence of this. And this proportion is rapidly increasing.

Business men must realize that this system of American slavery can not go on and trade conditions remain normal. . . .

We suggest that the business men get together and establish a round robin, go behind the cheap politicians and grafters, and go directly to the men who have the money invested in the mines and ask for justice for the men and a chance for their own investments. The business men as a body gave their moral support, and some of them their active support, to the mine owners during the strike, and this support determined the result. It is idle for them to stop now and debate whether or not they killed the goose that laid the golden egg. They have a right to demand decent respect for their interests. There are persistent rumors also of contemplated cuts in wages, here and there, which, if accomplished, will mean disaster to business men and property owners. Let these men reason together. It is a crisis in which they must act.

Comment is hardly necessary.

THE boycott of the International Union of Flour and Cereal Mill Employes against the Washburn-Crosby Company is said to be proving very effective. That unfair firm is doing its best to create the impression that the boycott has been declared off. Such is not the case. On the contrary, it is being pushed with vigor.

"Truth About the Detroit Conference."

In a circular dated June 8, 1905, and headed "The Truth About the Detroit Conference," William Green and George H. Ellis, of the United Typothetæ of America, attempt to counteract the good accomplished by the Detroit conference, and warn the book and job employers not to believe the newspaper reports sent out on the occasion of this meeting. There is something positively unique in this action of the typothetæ—a body of employers telling the public not to believe the newspaper accounts of a controversy. The shoe is usually on the other foot, and we of the unions are the ones who suffer from the press reports. Perhaps the publicity given to the typothetæ's unreasonable resistance to an immediate conference on the eight-hour question was what hurt most. For our part, we welcome all the light that can be had, knowing that all fair-minded men will see the justice and soundness of our position. The circular referred to closes with the significant declaration: "Don't swallow newspaper reports—get your information direct from headquarters." Selah!

An Echo of the Ziegler Explosion.

Our readers will remember the terrible explosion that occurred several months ago in the Leiter coal mine at Ziegler, Ill. It will be recalled that the trade unionists were blamed for the catastrophe, it being insinuated by a number of daily papers that union miners had caused the explosion to take place because it is a non-union mine. The following press dispatch may be of interest:

BENTON, ILL., June 2.—The grand jury today returned thirty indictments, four of which were against the Ziegler Coal Company and one against former Superintendent Hurd, growing out of the Ziegler mine explosion.

Hurd was indicted for permitting powder to be stored in the mine. Two like indictments, and one each for failing to put in crosscuts and for permitting the mine to be examined by an examiner without a certificate of competency, were returned against the Ziegler Coal Company.

At the conclusion of the second investigation of the mine explosion week before last, nothing definite was given out.

State Attorney Seeber has prepared and tomorrow will file in the county court information against Joseph Leiter, charging him with failure to put in crosscuts; against former Superintendent Hurd for permitting the mine to be examined by an examiner without a certificate of competency, and against Assistant Superintendent Whitter for storing powder in the mine.

Assistant Attorney General Gillespie was here to assist in the introduction of evidence before the grand jury, and assisted in preparing the indictments returned against Hurd and the Ziegler Coal Company.

Mr. Leiter has employed the following lawyers: Former Attorney General Hamlin, of Springfield; H. R. Platt, of Chicago; Judge W. H. Hart and W. S. Cantrell, of this city.

Attorney Frank Rockgold, representing the Russian, Austrian and Italian consuls at Chicago, has brought suit against Joseph Leiter to recover $150,000 damages on the lives of those who were killed in the explosions.

The number of men killed was about fifty.

He bases his suit on the alleged negligence of the Ziegler officials in complying with the state mining laws.

And the daily press is remarkably silent on the subject.

Labor and the Press.

How much longer are the trade unions of the country to be misrepresented in the columns of a majority of the daily papers? This is a question that has been discussed many times, and which has been revived by the misleading reports sent out from Chicago concerning the teamsters' strike. In this particular case the misrepresentation indulged in may be laid to the fact that many of the largest Chicago advertisers were involved in the trouble, and undoubtedly much pressure was brought to bear where it would do the most good. It is pretty well understood that without the advertising of the large department stores but few of the Chicago dailies could make both ends meet. It is also well known that the news furnished various papers over the country, known as "special correspondence" from Chicago, is made up of summaries of what appears in the Chicago papers, and is sent out by employes of those papers. Thus it will be seen that the policy of the majority of these outside papers is largely controlled by the policy of the Windy City newspapers. When these special dispatches reach the other papers of the country, they are "edited," and whatever there may chance to be in them favorable to labor is eliminated or changed. Any printer who works on a daily can confirm this. Time and again they have set up "takes" of telegraph copy relating to strikes, in which most of the matter that was favorable to the laboring man's side was marked out. Then, by the use of misleading heads and subheads, the dispatches are given a meaning utterly at variance with the facts in the case. In the Weekly Bulletin of the Clothing Trades, President William Mahon, of the Almalgamated Street Railway Employes of America, is quoted as saying:

I was in Chicago a whole week at the time when the newspaper reports were most lurid. I was out in the field all the time, and not one riot or attack did I see. Moreover, the official appointed by Governor Deneen to report the situation to him told me there was no rioting whatever. The newspaper reporters themselves told me the same thing. The papers are sore because the strike affects the big department stores, from which they get most of their advertising.

Another observer, a union man, writing from Chicago, declares:

If there is one thing that stands out more distinct than any other amid all the hubbub that has agitated Chicago the last few weeks, it is the despicable role played by the daily press of the city. For gross exaggeration, downright mendacity and shameless prostitution of a great function, the conduct of the local papers stands unparalleled. To fully appreciate it, one has to be here, to observe the baseness of the thing and to feel the growing sense of helplessness creeping over one as the gigantic effect of its influence becomes impressed upon one's brain.

The Zanesville (Ohio) Labor Journal, in an editorial on the subject, says:

In support of our contention, that the only truthful report that may be expected by wage workers in regard to labor difficulties can be found in the columns of the labor press, we call attention to the recent strike situation in Chicago, and particularly the reports sent out by the Associated Press and further garbled and doctored in the columns of our local dailies, which use only those parts that make the workingmen appear in the worst light and those which will most tickle the moneyed class.

A GREAT deal of space was recently given in the daily press to a story from Chicago to the effect that the Carriage and Wagon Workers' Union had hired thugs to murder a strike-breaker by the name of Carlstrom, and that they had done so. It now transpires that Carlstrom died from pneumonia. The hospital records and the coroner's verdict are proof of this statement. How much longer are we going to swallow press reports?

"The Art Club."

The employing printers of Indianapolis have a printers' board of trade, an organization that has for its object the maintenance of a certain scale of prices for printing. It is an unincorporated body—in fact, is a sort of "gentlemen's agreement." When a customer submits a job to one of the members of this board of trade the member immediately telephones the secretary of the board and informs him of the bid made on the work. The other members are then called up by the secretary, and told how to bid when the job is submitted to them. It will thus be seen that the customer has a fine chance. But the most curious part of the whole business is the fact that this organization is called "The Art Club" on the stationery used by it. What art is practiced by the members is not made plain. The fact that the interstate commerce laws deal with combinations in restraint of trade could not have been the cause of this attempt to conceal identity.

Pledge Hearty Support.

At the recent meeting of the Minnesota State Federation of Labor, an account of which is given in the correspondence department, the following resolutions were adopted, anent the eight-hour movement of the typographical union:

Whereas, The International Typographical Union, in convention assembled, in the city of St. Louis, in August, 1904, requested from the National Typothetæ, in convention in the same city, a conference looking to the securing of an eight-hour day for the book and job printers; and,

Whereas, The typographical convention, after the typothetæ convention had refused to consider in any way the proposition, adopted a resolution to submit to the referendum whether or not, on January 1, 1906, a demand would be made for an eight-hour day; and,

Whereas, The referendum vote resulted in an overwhelming majority for the eight-hour day, and as a result on January 1, 1906, the eight-hour day will be demanded in every book and job office under the jurisdiction of the International Typographical Union; and,

Whereas, The American Federation of Labor, in convention assembled, unanimously endorsed the action of the Typographical Union in the demands, and pledged an assessment on the membership to assist the printers in case of trouble; therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the delegates to the twenty-third annual convention of the state federation of labor, endorse the action of the Typographical Union in its just demands for the eight-hour day, and pledge to it our every support; be it further

Resolved, That we endorse the action of the American Federation of Labor in levying an assessment to assist the International Typographical Union, and pledge to the typographical unions of the state of Minnesota our moral and financial support, and assure them that should such support be desired it will be forthcoming liberally and promptly.

Secretary O'Connor, of Minneapolis (Minn.) No. 42, was the author of the resolutions.

The Teamsters' Union.

Professor John R. Commons, of the University of Wisconsin, whose series of articles on trade unions has been attracting considerable attention on account of the thoroughness and fairness displayed, in his last paper discusses the development of the teamsters' union of Chicago. After giving a detailed history of the formation and wonderful growth of this union, he draws a number of interesting comparisons of conditions prevailing among the teamsters before and after they organized. Professor Commons says that before the union was formed the teamsters of Chicago worked from seventy to one hundred hours a week. The average teamster's earnings before organization came to his relief were from $8 to $12 a week. Now that Job has smashed(?) the teamsters' union in Chicago, we suppose those conditions will again prevail.

From Parry's Own Town.

The following editorial appeared in the Indianapolis Sun on June 17. This paper has of late had a number of editorials along the same line, and has been very fair in its treatment of labor disputes. It is well for us to remember our friends. The union label occupies a prominent place at the head of the Sun's editorial columns. Read this:

IT DOES NOT CONDEMN THE WHOLE.

John C. Driscoll, former secretary of the Coal Team Owners' Association of Chicago, says that in four years he has paid over $80,000 to Chicago labor union leaders for the purpose of either averting or ending strikes.

What an opportunity for the prejudiced and unfair plutocratic press to shoot sarcasm at the unions! What an opportunity to cry "thief"—to damn anything and everything connected with organized labor!

There are many crooks. You may find them in church pews; in the homes on the avenue; in the fashionable clubs; riding in private cars; occupying positions of trust and great profit; yes, even in labor unions.

It is possible that John C. Driscoll has bribed and has found men in the unions weak enough to accept his dirty dollars.

But in the name of decency what has this to do with the sacred cause of organized labor?

Bigelow, Milwaukee banker, stole a million. Then all bankers must be thieves, following the same line of argument.

A minister disgraces his cloth, and so all ministers become hypocrites.

A public official loots the treasury, and therefore all public officials are crooks.

That isn't argument. It is rot and prejudice, but no more preposterous and unwise than the hatred of a class of dollar-worshipers who would, if they could, put organized labor where the peasants of Russia now are.

The few dishonest men in any organization can not harm that organization if its principles are based on right and justice.

The unions of America have their flaws and their faults, but their mission is the elevation of the toilers and the improvement of conditions in the homes.

The work will continue long after John C. Driscoll has passed on and been forgotten by better men.

Celebration at the Home.

The annual picnic at the Home this year will be in the nature of a barbecue, to be held on the Home grounds. Invitations have been extended to Denver Union No. 49, Cripple Creek No. 227, Pueblo No. 175 and Colorado Springs No. 82 to attend. The "boys" at the Home have subscribed something like $40 for fireworks. The usual sports, races, baseball, etc., will be held, and a local brass band has promised to go out to the grounds and help in the merrymaking.

FREDERICK DRISCOLL, commissioner of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, informs THE JOURNAL that he is in receipt of occasional requests for union linotype operators, machine tenders, admen, makeups, etc. The commissioner suggests that union members desiring situations of this character communicate with him at 1135-36 Stock Exchange Building, 108 La Salle street, Chicago, stating experience, habits and address.

Typothetæ Strike Benefits.

A man who is in close touch with the United Typothetæ of America, said recently that the book and job employers fully realize that the fight they are at present engaged in is a losing one—that the eight-hour day is coming, and will arrive on schedule time. But the gentleman asserted that the United Typothetæ of America is taking advantage of the eight-hour movement to strengthen its organization by getting in as many members as possible, mythical benefits in the way of strike insurance being the bait used to catch them. This strike benefit plan is somewhat similar to the one which D. M. Parry introduced at the Atlanta manufacturers' meeting recently, and which was rejected by the association of which he is president. This system of insurance may be all right for a while—as long as no money has to be paid out—but, like the get-rich-quick man's scheme, when a run starts, it will go out of business in short order.

Declined With Thanks.

The Newark (N. J.) Sunday Call received a typothetæ circular and was asked to ally itself with that association to fight the eight-hour movement. The following, which appeared in the Call's editorial columns, is self-explanatory:

An invitation to join in opposition to an eight-hour day for printers is respectfully declined by the Sunday Call. We believe in shorter hours for workingmen, and maintain the eight-hour schedule in this office. Some time we hope to include the non-mechanical departments in the arrangement.

TARRYTOWN-OSSINING (N. Y.) Union No. 523 recently held its second annual banquet, and the Ossining Daily Citizen, in connection with giving the local union a "writeup," had the following to say editorially:

Under the jurisdiction of the International Typographical Union, the hundreds of "locals" throughout the land are conducted on broad plans. Strikes are rare, and every possible means is resorted to to use conservative methods in arranging disputes between the employer and employe. Some of the leading statesmen, authors and merchants carry the cards of the International Union, and, while not actively engaged in the trade, are happy to be identified with this worthy organization.

In Ossining and Tarrytown the local is composed of deserving young men; men who realize that they owe to their employer the same duty they owe to themselves. In less than three years the scale of wages has been raised over $3 per week, and the hours of labor shortened from sixty hours to forty-eight hours per week.

It is an incentive for better work, and makes the men think more of their jobs, and it also allows the employing printers to expect better work and enables them to hire just the kind they want.

Another State Report.

The third general report of the New York department of labor, recently issued, is a very thorough document. Many phases of the labor question are discussed. Speaking of trade unions, the state labor commissioner says:

In their situation it is not to be wondered at that the trade union appears to offer the single ray of hope, and that it receives a measure of loyalty and devotion that in former times went only to the church. And as the people at large have come to understand the situation of the wage-earning class they have revised their earlier judgments of the trade union movement. It is worthy of note, for instance, that the workers in social settlements who have gone from homes of ease to live among the poorer classes are virtually unanimous in maintaining the principle of trade unionism as the only method of stopping that underbidding for work which leads to starvation wages and interminable hours of labor. But it is only when some tremendous revolt against existing conditions like that of the anthracite coal miners in 1902 compels the people generally to study the condition of wage workers that they begin to comprehend the invaluable work of the trade union as the bulwark of the American standard of living.

The Shorter Workday.

In discussing the shorter workday the Indianapolis Morning Star says, editorially: "Experience has proven it worth while to the employer, as well as the employed. What the employer wants is results, and the world is coming to realize that results in any kind of work can not often be measured by the amount of time put on it. Nearly a year ago a large Indianapolis concern changed its office hours from 7 to 8 in the morning and from 6 to 5 in the afternoon. Notwithstanding this cutting off of two hours from the working day, it has got more and better work from its large office force. It is on the same principle that the New York business man transacts more business between 9 and 3 o'clock than does the western man between 8 and 5; the same principle that enables the city lawyer to accomplish a great deal more during the daylight hours than do those lawyers in country towns that have the habit of keeping open their offices in the evening. All play and no work is worse for a man or woman than all work and no play; the best results are had when one works hard while he works and gives a reasonable time to play, rest and repose. The most conspicuous type of the well-balanced man we have before us today is President Roosevelt, whose enormous capacity for rapid and effective work is equaled by his ability to have pure, wholesome fun and lots of it when he plays and to repose absolutely when he rests. It is an excellent example to follow."

It Don't Look Good to Him.

Councilman John E. Burke, of Norfolk, Va., on his return from the recent meeting of employing printers of the southwest, had the following to say in an interview in the Norfolk Ledger:

There were 247 employing book and job printers present, said Mr. Burke. We are confronted with a serious situation, which is brought about by the newspaper printers butting in on a contented lot of workmen. Book and job printers have heretofore been satisfied with nine hours for a day's work, and never would have made a demand for shorter hours if they had not been prodded by the newspaper printers. If we are not successful in defeating the project the public will suffer, not the employing printers. It is the custom, as in all well regulated businesses, to figure the cost of work and add a reasonable percentage of profit. If the union insists on an eight-hour schedule it will necessitate adding 18 per cent to the price of all printing. Thus the public suffers.

Several more conventions of employing book and job printers will be held in various sections of the United States with the same object in view as that treated at our meeting. It is our purpose to organize local chapters of United Typothetæ of America, with the hope of successfully opposing the unjust demands of organized labor, but I am sorry to say the outlook is not very brilliant.

THE book and job employer tells you the public will not pay the increased price he will be obliged to charge for printing under the eight-hour system. He tells you a reduction of an hour in the workday will mean an increase in the cost of production of 22 per cent (see latest typothetæ circular). By what mysterious mathematical process this figure is arrived at is as yet unexplained. Take a pencil and try to do it yourself. Of course you must allow for a saving in power, in light, in wear and tear of machinery, and in the thousand and one little expenses that accrue during working hours. Then on the right side of the ledger must also be placed the increased efficiency of the force, arising from the better physical and mental condition of the individual.

An Effective Boycott.

The following paragraph is taken from a recent issue of American Industries, a paper "of, by, and for the manufacturers of the United States," according to the heading used on its first page:

> Judge Morrow, of the United States Circuit Court, at San Francisco, has granted an order restraining the California Federation of Labor and the local labor unions from boycotting D. E. Loewe & Co., a firm of hat manufacturers of Danbury, Conn. It is stated in the complaint that the action of the labor unions in instructing the retailers to handle union-made hats exclusively has caused a cessation in the demand for eastern hats on the coast.

The Danbury hat concern does not seem to be able to see the boycott in the same light as C. W. Post. The effect of this particular action of the California Federation of Labor has been rather far-reaching—from the Atlantic to the Pacific. But all the restraining orders in the world will not compel union men to buy non-union products. Ask for the label. No court can compel you to purchase what you don't want.

ORGANIZER LEACHE has received a letter from the editor and manager of the Halletsville (Texas) Herald, in which that gentleman encloses the application of his foreman for membership in the union and says: "I was thinking of sending my application in also, but thought it advisable to first write you. I am not now working at the case, but am a thorough job and newspaper printer. In applying for membership it would not be for the purpose of securing employment at the case, but simply to illustrate my faith and belief in the typographical union. I believe in it firmly, and where given an opportunity have always maintained union rates. My membership would be for the purpose of assisting the union in any way possible, financially as well as otherwise."

Another Question Mark Circular.

The asking of questions seems to have become epidemic with the talking delegates of the different typothetæ organizations. The employing printers of Philadelphia have sent out a little booklet, on the cover of which is the interrogation: "Do You Want the Eight-Hour Day on January 1, 1906?" THE JOURNAL has been favored with one of these little books by a member, and takes this occasion to answer the question—"Yes."

The booklet in question contains a couple of articles reprinted from a Philadelphia typothetæ organ, which are supposed to be arguments against the shorter workday. They close with the usual typothetæ appeal to send in your money for membership, though what benefits will accrue to the applicant is hardly made plain. There is some vague talk about "emergency fund" and "insurance," but just how these mythical benefits are to be obtained is not very clearly set forth. The small proprietors are "getting wise," as is shown by several articles in the present issue of THE JOURNAL.

A Label Sermonette.

A prominent student of sociology who recently paid a visit to one of the state penitentiaries of the central west, is reported as saying:

> In going through the contract cigar factory of the prison I saw six convicts in advanced stages of consumption, making cigars. They would moisten the wrappers with their tongues and lips.

Moral—Call for the blue label, and you don't run any chances of getting a cigar made by one of those fellows.

THE annual banquet of New Orleans Typographical Union No. 17 was held on Sunday, May 21. The menu for the occasion, a copy of which was kindly sent to THE JOURNAL, is a creditable specimen of typographical art, executed in purple and gold. The following toasts were responded to: "The International Typographical Union," G. G. Norris; "New Orleans Typographical Union," H. S. Hudspeth; "The Eight-Hour Day," C. G. Satterley; "The Newspaper Printer," J. J. Tucker; "The Job Printer," M. J. Farrier; "The Ladies,"

Clarence Parker. The entertainment committee for the occasion was composed of Oscar Schumert, John Appleby, H. F. Mattox, I. A. Strauss and N. T. Markey.

EVERY once in a while you hear some member claiming that the small union has no part in the lawmaking of our International body, not being financially able to send a delegate. Any member who thinks our laws can be improved is competent to propose amendments. All that has to be done is to write out the amendment and mail it to the International secretary-treasurer, marked "for consideration of law committee." It will be referred to that committee, and reported to the convention.

THE book and job employer will tell you he works nine, ten or twelve hours a day, and say it does not hurt him, and he scoffs at our demand for an eight-hour workday. Grant that he does put in that much time—and few of them do—what does it signify? There is a vast difference in the way the time is spent. The employer does his work generally in a well-ventilated business office; he can go out into the fresh air whenever he wishes; he is not obliged to eat a cold lunch in the poison-laden air of the workroom, but generally takes his own time to get a wholesome meal, and comes back to the office refreshed for the afternoon's work. The unhealthy conditions surrounding the average composing room are too well known, and are too often discussed by medical authorities to be entered into here. Let the employer spend a day in the workroom, filling his lungs with the deadly dust from the type or the poisonous gases from the linotype metal pots, and see how quickly he will change his views on the shorter workday question. Give the printer a chance to get the fresh air into his lungs and throw out the poison, and he will show up the next morning a better printer, worth more to the office—a better investment, both mentally and physically, than you can get under the nine-hour system. It must also be remembered that the employer is working for himself—building for the future. No just comparison is possible where conditions differ so radically.

The St. Louis Incident.

Owing to the fact that St. Louis Union has rescinded its illegal action in signing a nine-hour contract, the editor of THE JOURNAL deemed it advisable to eliminate from the correspondence all reference to the incident. As far as possible the review of this affair has been confined to the official statement published elsewhere.

Eight-Hour Resolutions.

The following resolutions were passed by Denver Union No. 49 at its regular meeting on June 4:

Whereas, The International Typographical Union has inaugurated a campaign, the object of which is the attainment of the eight-hour day for the unions under its jurisdiction; and,

Whereas, It has been demonstrated by practically all the skilled crafts in American industry and by some local unions of the International Typographical Union that the eight-hour day is feasible and practical and warranted by the introduction of labor-saving machinery; it has been shown to be beneficial to the health and mental development of workers wherever inaugurated; it has given to the community a better class of citizens, and to the employer a better grade of workmanship; therefore,

Resolved, That Denver Typographical Union No. 49 hereby extends to the eight-hour committee of the International Typographical Union its unqualified approval and support in its efforts to elevate the standard of citizenship of the members by the inauguration of the eight-hour day; and further

Resolved, That we look with disfavor on any proposition which may be construed as a temporizing measure on this important subject, and we pledge our assistance, both moral and financial, to the attainment of this desired end. The delegates to the convention of the International Typographical Union at Toronto from Denver Typographical Union No. 49 are hereby instructed to support with voice and vote the International eight-hour committee in its efforts to bring about the eight-hour day.

ALEXANDER SPENCER, a prominent member of Chicago Typographical Union No. 16, asks the employing printer the following questions anent the open shop discussion:

Would you not contract to do all the printing for a business house and thus shut out competition, if you could? Why have we not the same right to so dispose of our labor, especially when membership is open to all honest and competent printers?

Mr. Spencer's letter, printed in this issue of THE JOURNAL, is well worth reading and considering. It is headed "Eight Hours and Open Shop."

THE Houston (Texas) labor temple was dedicated on June 14. An immense audience gathered at the exercises, and several noted speakers addressed the assemblage. Among others was the Hon. Presley K. Ewing, who, after felicitating the union men of Houston on their splendid enterprise, said in reference to the eight-hour movement:

> First among the demands of the labor union is its sturdy and uncompromising demand for an eight-hour system in the government employ. If the reform can be anchored in the government, other industrial employers will speedily follow. To a union man the eight-hour law is much like the gospel to a devoted Christian. It means so much for him. It means time for his family, time to devote to the republic and make a better citizen, and it encourages larger opportunity for labor. How can anybody out of the union oppose the just demand of labor? It considers the wage earners, who are the great masses of the people. And in considering and ministering to these it uplifts humanity and directly affects the best interests of this country.

In the correspondence columns of this issue of THE JOURNAL will be found a detailed description and halftone of the building.

SUPPOSE we admit that all the wild and improbable assertions of Driscoll about bribing union leaders of Chicago are true—and we don't—how many of the people who furnished the money will go to jail? Driscoll's appearance before the Cook county grand jury was a disappointment to union-hating newspapers in Chicago. He had done so much talking about how he was going to "expose" a lot of corruption that these papers had their wood type all ready to proclaim to the world an appalling state of rottenness. But the good copy did not pan out. Mr. Driscoll simply made a general statement to the jury, mentioning no names, times or places. Driscoll, be it known, is the man who claims to have been the "fixer" for the employers for the past two years. In speaking of the hearing, State's Attorney Healy said: "Much of his talk was hysterical, and he was inclined to repeat. We did not get much from him." Driscoll is credited by the Chicago Post with saying: "Fred Job, for the employers, spends money upon detectives and in getting non-union teamsters who don't know how to drive. I didn't keep any payroll, so I didn't show one to the jurors."

What We Are Doing

Eight Hours on January 1, 1906, is provided for in the contracts just sent in to headquarters by Ashland (Wis.) Union No. 146.

Eight Hours has been arranged for by Kewanee (Ill.) Union No. 164, to go into effect on January 1, 1906. So writes Secretary Curtis.

Eight Hours is now the workday in Salt Lake City. The secretary of No. 115 writes THE JOURNAL that the eight-hour day became effective there on July 1.

Eight Hours is now the workday of San Luis Obispo (Cal.) Union No. 576. Secretary Finney writes THE JOURNAL that they wish to be placed in the band wagon.

Eight Hours is the workday of Memphis (Tenn.) Union No. 11, beginning the 1st of July of this year. A slight increase in the rate per hour was secured.

Eight Hours for Vincennes (Ind.) Union No. 395 on January 1, 1906. Contracts were recently signed with the employers of that place fixing the first of next year as the date on which the shorter workday will be inaugurated.

Eight Hours was given the members of Waterville (Me.) Union No. 643, without having to even ask for it. Secretary Callaghan of that union writes that on the first day of June the local proprietors gave the members of the union a banquet and the eight-hour day. Pretty good for a new union.

Eight Hours now constitutes the length of the workday of Ottawa (Ont.) Union No. 102. The secretary writes THE JOURNAL as follows: "I am pleased to inform you that the eight-hour day went into force here on June 1, without any friction. In fact, we have made great gains, having unionized two offices which have not before been in line, and have started them off with the eight-hour day. There is at present in this city practically only one office outside the union, employing one man, two women and a boy."

Eight Hours on January 1, 1906, is provided for in the contract recently signed by Bellefontaine (Ohio) Union No. 613 with Clarence Cappell, proprietor of a printing establishment of that city.

Eight Hours on the first of the year will be secured without any trouble by Altoona (Pa.) Union No. 240, writes Secretary Leader of that union. The scale signed on May 1 gives morning and evening newspaper employes $2.50 per day and book and job men $15 per week. The contract runs under the nine-hour day until December 31 of the present year.

Eight Hours for Chickasha (I. T.) Union No. 81 on January 1, 1906. Secretary King has just forwarded to International headquarters copies of contracts recently signed by the employers of that town, and in a letter accompanying them he says: "We succeeded in raising the scale $2 per week and the eight-hour day is granted, to go into effect on January 1, 1906, which looks mighty good to us."

Eight Hours was gained without trouble by Greenville (Tex.) Union No. 509. On April 1 a contract was signed with every office but one in that city providing for the eight-hour workday on January 1, 1906. These contracts run until January 1, 1907. The local secretary writes THE JOURNAL that the office that refused to sign a contract agrees to employ none but union men and will abide by union conditions, including the eight-hour day.

Eight Hours has been conceded by the Kiernan Printing Company of New Haven, Conn. The new schedule became effective on June 1. An officer of the company in explaining the stand taken is quoted as follows: "It has always been the policy of this company never to antagonize its workmen. The International Typographical Union is excellently organized and refusal to meet their demands will result in a bitter strike of long duration. We have good men here whom we do not care to lose, and we will therefore start the eight-hour day next Monday."

Eight Hours is favored by the Samuel Jones Printing Company, of Dallas, Texas. A letter was recently received by Dallas Typographical Union No. 173 from that company, in which it asks to be put on record as favoring the eight-hour scale which the union is at the present time endeavoring to adopt. The firm gives as its reason for favoring this scale the fact that the extra efforts put forth by the printers will more than repay the employer for the one hour which will be cut off the working time.

COLUMBIA (Pa.) Typographical Union No. 610, organized May 5, of this year, by Organizer Woodrow, has already met with noteworthy success. On June 1, in less than one month, every office had signed the scale for one year, which gives the printers an increase of 25 per cent in wages and one hour less per day.

Reading Notices

ACCORDING to a dispatch sent THE JOURNAL by Wood and Nathan, the public printer has ordered seventy-two additional monotypes for use in the government printing office at Washington. This will make 100 of these machines at work there. The monotype people say this is the largest typesetting-machine order ever given.

WHAT THEY THINK OF THE JOURNAL.

J. E. Ayers, New York.—"I would be lost without it. It is the best printers' journal ever printed."

J. J. Henry, Knoxville, Tenn.—"We are all glad to note that THE JOURNAL continues to grow better, if such be possible, with each issue."

J. G. Kanely, New York City.—"THE JOURNAL, under your able and efficient management, has become, among the many papers which reach my house, the most useful and indispensable."

T. W. McCullough, Editor Omaha Bee.—"I very much admire THE JOURNAL, and have especially enjoyed its last few numbers, its last number (June) being almost an ideal of what such a publication should be."

SECTION 131, GENERAL LAWS.

No local union shall sign a contract guaranteeing its members to work for any proprietor, firm or corporation, unless such contract is in accordance with International law and approved by the International President.

THE EIGHT-HOUR DAY STILL GAINING FRIENDS.

Continuing their mass-meeting idea, there was held in Boston in the latter part of May an assemblage of the employing printers of New England. It is said that 382 people were present, but it is not claimed that all of these were "employing printers." The American Printer says that "the meeting was called to order by J. Stearns Cushing in the rooms of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company in Faneuil hall. Mr. Cushing was elected chairman of the meeting and George H. Simonds secretary. After addresses by a number of members a committee composed of one man from each state represented was appointed to draw up a resolution embodying the sentiment of the meeting on the demand of the International Typographical Union for a shorter workday, January 1, 1906." We are further informed by the same authority that "a recess was held while the committee was in session, during which the members proceeded to get better acquainted with each other. The committee then made a report which was in effect the resolution passed at Atlanta the previous week, but amended to suit local conditions. After some short addresses the resolution was passed unanimously. By five o'clock the business had all been transacted, the only other happening of note being an application of the secretary of the Boston Typographical Union for the privilege of being present at the meeting. The request was denied. The one impression brought away by those attending the meeting and dinner was the enthusiasm and celerity with which the business in hand was disposed of." The foregoing view of the Boston employers' meeting is from one of the employers' organs, and is given to our membership instead of the regular report reaching us, so that the injected optimism may become apparent. And in the meantime we continue to make eight-hour contracts, as is evidenced by the July eight-hour bulletin.

EIGHT-HOUR MEETINGS MULTIPLYING.

Eight-hour meetings are becoming decidedly popular, not alone with the employers but also with the employes. We are informed that further mass meetings of the employers will be held at central points. During June, St. Paul Typographical Union turned its well-attended regular monthly meeting into an eight-hour meeting, and on the following evening Minneapolis Typographical Union No. 42 held an eight-hour meeting, about 350 members attending. In Chicago, in June, there was an eight-hour conference with representatives of twenty unions present, and reports of that conference have been distributed widely. In Rahway, N. J., a delegate conference was also held, following one previously convening in Orange. The next conference is scheduled for Somerville. An eight-hour conference was held in Dallas, Texas, attended by representatives of the typographical unions in that state. It is proposed to hold eight-hour rallies at new points in states where meetings of this character have already taken place. These conventions afford opportunity for the exchange of views and for the formation of plans, and they also serve to stimulate and disseminate eight-hour enthusiasm. That the eight-hour movement is stronger than even its adherents have maintained was amply demonstrated during the month of June, which was really a banner month for the eight-hour propaganda.

THIS ALSO IN THE MONTH OF JUNE.

Memphis Typographical Union No. 11 has negotiated an eight-hour contract with all the book and job employers in its jurisdiction. An advance in wages per hour was secured. A member of the committee, writing on the negotiations, says: "It is an especial pride to the committee that we are the first in the South to get this concession, and we hope it will be an encouragement to others. I wish, by the way, to express our appreciation of the prompt action of the executive council in the St. Louis matter. This action carried great weight with the typothetæ, as we, being in conference with the Memphis body at the time, are able to testify." Memphis Typographical Union deserves the success that has attended its efforts. Recently the union appropriated $500 with which to thoroughly organize adjacent territory, and at the same time pledged an additional $500 if it was apparent that it could be used to advantage.

THE EMPLOYERS AT PHILADELPHIA.

There was another meeting of employing printers in June. Philadelphia entertained the "masters" from the middle states. Nothing new developed. The resolutions adopted at the Atlanta meeting, reproduced in this department last month, were changed slightly and then rushed through the Philadelphia assemblage. One attending employer made a strong speech in support of the eight-hour day, and luckily escaped with his life. He said: "I can only say, for my own firm, which has prospered under an eight-hour agreement, that we shall assist the International Typographical Union in every way possible in its fight for an eight-hour day, which is sure to come, whether you defeat the International Union or not." The gathering "went wild with enthusiasm" when a speaker said: "We want to get some ginger in us so that we shall feel that we are opposed to anything the International Union is in favor of and in favor of anything the International Union is opposed to." The president of the United Typothetæ is credited with these remarkable assertions: He "branded as false the statement, sedulously circulated by the International Typographical Union, that the typothetæ had refused overtures toward an amicable adjustment of the point at issue." He was wildly applauded for this sentiment: "We must stand together on January 1, 1906, and fight to the bitter end, if necessary. We desire a shorter workday, but to stand a strike for it is a different proposition. It means the life of our business, as contrasted with the ethical question of a shorter workday. When the situation is put fairly before the country the country will be with us. The rank and file of the International Typographical Union, while desiring the shorter day, would not go into a fight for it. The referendum vote, by which the arbitrary demand was carried, showed that less than half of the membership voted, and of these about 20 per cent were against the proposition." However, from a former experience, we are of the opinion that the press has again misquoted the employers' chief.

TRUE—BUT UNEXPECTED BY THE SECRETARY.

The United Typothetæ of America has contributed materially to the prosperity of the printing industry in prosecuting its propaganda of opposition to the eight-hour day, in issuing numerous circulars setting forth the organization's antipathy. One of these circulars was, by error, of course, sent to the editor of the Granite Cutters' Journal, and that trade union official has furnished me with a copy of his rejoinder. It follows:

"June 10, 1905.

"Mr. John Macintyre, Secretary, United Typothetæ of America, 320 Broadway, New York:

"DEAR SIR—As editor of the Granite Cutters' Journal and manager of the printing office of that association, I received your circular letter in reference to the resolution of your association in St. Louis, June, 1904, and the resolution of the International Typographical Union in St. Louis, August, 1904, and have carefully read all you have to say on the subject.

"In reply permit me to say I do not agree with your conclusions. Our association is not only ready for the eight-hour workday in our printing office, but we have had it in use for a number of years and find it both profitable and practical. You are entirely mistaken in your statement about increased cost and decreased output, and if your association will adopt the eight-hour day in your printing establishments, you will find it one of the best changes you could possibly make, in fact, desirable from every standpoint.

"We have other experience to draw upon than our printing office in this direction, for the members of our association are themselves now, and have been for a number of years, on an eight-hour workday system, and so satisfactory has it been to employer and employe of our trade, that there has not been one firm from the Atlantic to the Pacific since the system was put in use who cared to be quoted as favoring an extension of the workday beyond the eight-hour limit, nor do any of them complain about increased cost of manufacturing and decreased output.

"With a reasonable workday men go to the shop bright and cheerful, are willing to work and do so in a creditable manner; with a longer workday their ambition is lost and they work grudgingly and too often when their employer is busy elsewhere shirk their duties. The eight-hour workday permits employes to have a little time with their families and for social intercourse, which helps to make better men and women of them, and this being so they could not fail to be better and more profitable workers.

"Your reference to El Paso, Texas, is much overdrawn and in any event is not a fair criterion. It is evident even from your own testimony that the attempted experiment in that city was entered into grudgingly and with a desire to as near as possible show that the eight-hour workday was a failure, and the reference has as much the appearance of being gotten up for effect as had the notorious report of Carrol D. Wright some time ago about the cost of living.

"After giving the subject deliberate consideration along the most practical lines possible, we take this opportunity in replying to your circular letter to invite the United Typothetæ of America to adopt the eight-hour workday system, and in doing so conscientiously believe that after the system has been given a fair trial you will be found writing to some other association on equally favorable lines to the legislation in question as is cheerfully written to you in this document.

"Yours truly,
"(Signed) JAMES DUNCAN,
"National Secretary."

THE COUNTRY EMPLOYER AGAIN.

Under the heading "Trying to Work Country Publishers," the following article appeared recently in the Akeley (Minn.) Tribune. It is fairly representative of the stand that is being taken by the country employers in resisting the efforts of the typothetæ to compel them to give up part of their receipts to the employers' organization: "The Tribune is in receipt of a circular letter from the typothetæ (or master printers of the northwestern cities) the purport of which is to enlist the country publisher's sympathy in resisting an inevitable strike of their employes on January 1, 1906, unless the typothetæ yields to the printers' demand for an eight-hour day. The typothetæ is a powerful organization of employing printers of the cities who control the prices of printing with an iron hand. Their profits have been enormous—entirely out of proportion with the wages received by their employes. And now that the printers make only a just demand, the country publisher is appealed to. He is requested to remit $2 membership fee into an organization, the members of which are invariably sending their representatives into certain territories and 'butting in' on the country publisher's business. The average country newspaper man will politely inform the typothetæ to go to——and extend to their printers the best wishes for success in their commendable undertaking. Eight hours of the gait established in the city printshop is quite enough to kill any of them before their proper time comes."

THE SHAM MADE APPARENT.

We have had trouble with the Muskogee Times. The following statement by the paper affected looks familiar; we've seen it before: "Just what excuse there was for the walkout, the management has been unable to see. There was no controversy between the Times and its employes as to wages or hours; this paper was already paying as high, and in many cases higher wage than its competitors; the hours were the same; very friendly relations seemed to exist between the management and the employes, and the walkout came as a shock and surprise." But the observations of one of the Times' contemporaries on the stereotyped excuse quoted are so pat and so cleverly expose its hypocrisy that they are well worth reproducing: "The union printers of Muskogee, from all reports, seem to be a decidedly discriminating lot, with no sense of appreciation whatever. In one office in the city, where they have been paid higher wages and treated better than anywhere else, 'where the most friendly relations exist,' 'without cause and without a moment's warning, they go on a strike,' they threaten, they menace, they 'spike' the press and commit no end of outrage against a kind and considerate employer. In the other offices in the city where a good day's work is required for a good day's wage, and is given where the employer and employed each knows his place, and keeps it, and there is no time for twaddle about 'friendly relations,' 'kindly feeling,' etc., etc.; where the output corresponds to the outlay, and where wages are not more than commensurate with a decent living in a town of such high rent and other expenses as in Muskogee, we hear of no trouble. That all the trouble should occur in the office where all the friendly sentiment and kindly feeling and overflowing love and top wages hold sway, is probably only another evidence of the perversity of unionism, and the union printers and the employers who do not have trouble are no doubt deserving of unscathing rebuke, while the man of high wages and loving sentiment toward his help is entitled to great public sympathy. Just why an intelligent public fails to indulge in an uprising under these galling conditions is the great mystery that is perplexing at least one mind in Muskogee this afternoon."

Digitized by Google

A REMARKABLE CIRCULAR.

Under date of June 19 the Chicago Typothetæ issued a most remarkable address "to the book and job printers of Chicago." After reciting the usual plea of increased cost that would go with an eight-hour day, this body blow is delivered: "If employers could not make a profit on the work of their compositors they would soon be compelled to shut down." That goes without any attempt at rebuttal. But if the day was of four hours, there would still be a demand for commercial printing, and plants to do the work. We are then told that the mass meetings of employers have agreed "that the eight-hour day could not be granted." Remarkable unanimity! Then there is given an excerpt from an article in a trade publication, contributed by a former union official, the partial quotation used to create the impression that the writer believed the eight-hour crusade would meet with defeat. Questionable ethics! With perfectly proper indignation it is pointed out that the employers did not propose the shorter workday. Granted again! The St. Louis incident is referred to. "It also takes the matter of Chicago employers agreeing to an eight-hour day entirely out of the realm of argument." Well, for the sake of the "argument," one obstacle has been removed. "The employing printers of Chicago desire to continue friendly relations with their employes, and it rests with the employes themselves to decide whether or no these relations shall be changed." Disputed; the obligation is at least mutual. The assertion is not compatible with the ultimatum with which the circular concludes: "Of one thing, however, the compositors may be assured: The eight-hour day will not be granted by the employers. On that point, this is absolutely the last word, notwithstanding any assertions to the contrary." Oh, pshaw! Let us at least say a few more words. Where's the harm?

THEY ARE "UNALTERABLY OPPOSED."

On the committee on resolutions at the Boston meeting of the "masters" were three men from small New England towns doing business on a ten-hour basis, wages not to exceed ten dollars a week. Needless to say these three "captains of industry" were violently opposed to the "impossible" eight-hour day. To attempt to add anything to the testimony of these three tailors of Tooley street would be "to attempt to gild refined gold—to paint the lily—to throw a perfume on the violet—to smooth the ice—or add another hue unto the rainbow—in every aspect of it, wasteful and ridiculous excess."

NOTES.

The Georgia Federation of Labor declared that "on the successful outcome of the efforts being put forth by the International Typographical Union for the establishment of a universal eight-hour day for the printers depends to a great extent the success of similar movements in other industries," and "that should the International Union become involved in trouble through the inauguration of the eight-hour day on January 1, 1906, we pledge to it all financial assistance which it is in our power to grant."

The Minnesota State Federation of Labor and the Georgia State Federation of Labor have pledged financial support, if necessary, to our eight-hour movement. Other state bodies have pledged support, and it will be financial when desired. The American Federation is on record with financial support, and we are acting with the consciousness that the deity helps those who help themselves.

"Whenever any vested wrong is to be righted or any long-standing abuse corrected, those who profit by the wrong or the abuse are prompt to pose as the defenders of property and to charge the reformers with attacking property rights," says William Jennings Bryan in the Saturday Evening Post.

Twelve hundred members of No. 16 attended the regular June meeting, and by rising vote made manifest their support for the eight-hour day.

The eight-hour buttons are a distinct hit, and are in great demand.

If you desire more buttons, write.

Woman's Department

WOMAN'S INTERNATIONAL AUXILIARY.

President—Mrs. Frank A. Kennedy, 2603 North Twentieth street, Omaha, Neb.

Secretary—Mrs. Ed D. Donnell, 906 West Eighth street, Cincinnati, Ohio.

OMAHA, NEB.

To the Officers and Members of Local Auxiliaries:

All subordinate auxiliaries to the Woman's International Auxiliary are entitled to a representative at the third annual convention of the International Auxiliary to be held in Toronto, Canada, opening Tuesday morning, August 15, 1905.

The International law reads: Each local auxiliary shall be entitled to one (1) delegate. Auxiliaries having a membership of one hundred and fifty (150) or over shall be entitled to one additional delegate.

We urgently request that every local auxiliary will send a delegate to this convention, as important questions pertaining to the welfare of our International body will come up.

MRS. FRANK A. KENNEDY, President.
MRS. ED DONNELL, Secretary-Treasurer.

LINCOLN, NEB.

Owing to lack of time, the writer takes the following from the Wageworker, our worthy "labor organ":

THE PRINTERS' MEMORIAL DAY.

In pursuance of a custom established a year ago Lincoln Typographical Union No. 209, assisted by Capital Auxiliary No. 11, observed Sunday, May 28, as memorial day, and on that day especial tributes of respect were paid to the honored dead of the union.

In the morning the union and auxiliary to the number of nearly fifty gathered at the Lindell hotel, and at 10:30 marched in a body to the First Congregational Church. Rev. J. E. Tuttle, the pastor, preached a sermon on "Brotherhood," and from the text, "All ye are brethren," he drew a lesson of fraternity and humanity that made a deep impress upon the minds of his hearers. He pointed out the fact that before men could be brothers in fact, with all of the love that brothers have, there must be the tie of a common fatherhood, and this common fatherhood exists only in God. As earthly brothers look up to and emulate the example of the elder brother, so brethren in the world, acknowledging a common fatherhood, should look up to and emulate the example of the elder brother, Christ Jesus. The sermon was prepared with especial reference to the typographical union's memorial, and the members appreciated the earnestness and the sentiment of the sermon. The morning service of song was along patriotic lines, and was fully appreciated.

In the afternoon the union and the auxiliary took a special car to Wyuka, and on the lot owned by the union memorial services were held. The service was opened with prayer, and the assembly then sang "Blest Be the Tie that Binds." Addresses by members of union were delivered. The assembly then sang "Nearer, My God, to Thee," and then as the roll of the union's dead was called members of the auxiliary stepped forward and laid at the foot of the banner the memorial flowers brought as tributes to the departed members. Miss Ruth Walter then sounded "taps," after which the graves of all the union dead were visited and decorated with flowers. The ceremonies were impressive and were witnessed by a large number, who were attracted to the spot by the singing and the sight of the union banner.

We believe the change of meeting place from the homes to a hall in the central part of the city will be a success.

At a recent meeting of Capital Auxiliary the members were presented with eight-hour buttons, which we consider an honor to wear.

Plans for our June social are under way.

MRS. C. B. RIGHTER.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.

No. 3 held its regular monthly meeting June 13, and though the attendance was somewhat less than previous months, the interest in general affairs proved a balancing power.

Last month, unknowingly and unconsciously, we made a mistake in stating that Mrs. P. M. Schmitt was our alternate delegate to Toronto, she having received the second highest number of votes as candidate for delegate. According to section 2, p. 10, of the International constitution, the alternate must be nominated and elected same as the delegate.

This was done, Mesdames J. P. Banks and H. S. Fenton being the nominees, Sister Fenton being elected, by a large majority, alternate delegate. Sister Schmitt declined the nomination or she would have undoubtedly been the favored one.

The retiring president, Mrs. William Benseman, in her usual gracious, quiet manner, installed the newly-elected officers for the incoming year, after which she was presented with a beautiful sherbet set from the members as a token of appreciation of her good work the past year.

As our year draws to a close, in behalf of No. 3, we desire to extend our sincere thanks to our brother editor, J. W. Bramwood, for his kindness to and interest shown in our organization in publishing our articles as they appeared from time to time. THE JOURNAL becomes more to us each month.

VIRGINIA R. FENTON.

BALTIMORE, MD.

The twenty-third session of No. 28 was held, as usual, in Heptasophs' Hall (and, by the way, we have a beautiful meeting place). I am sorry to say that our attendance and membership is becoming smaller instead of increasing. Lack of attendance, due to lack of interest, both on the part of members and the "printer man." Out of a membership of nearly 500 Baltimore typos there is an auxiliary of only twenty-five members in good standing. As some one has said, "Are all these printers bachelors?" If so, have they no sisters or mothers who take interest in them? Poor men.

I am delighted to say we will have a voice in the convention at Toronto this year, the favored one being Mrs. Sarah J. Frazier, whose husband is a delegate to the same. (Mrs. T. F. Brady as alternate.) We intend giving her a sackful of instructions, but we hope she will not have to pay duty on them after she crosses the line. We wish them both a most delightful time.

On May 22d we held a public euchre at the Heptasophs' Hall. Thirty handsome prizes were given to an equal number of persons who had won the greater number of games, but as most of the recipients were strangers, I failed to get their names. Ice cream was on sale, and the euchre was followed by dancing. Every one seemed to spend an enjoyable evening, and the affair was a success both socially and financially.

MRS. T. F. BRADY.

CINCINNATI, OHIO.

In the early part of last May Mrs. Kennedy, our International president, addressed a letter to each of the auxiliaries under the jurisdiction of the International body in which she appeals to the membership to instruct their delegates to Toronto to vote to reduce the per capita tax to 10 cents per quarter.

Every auxiliary member who reads THE JOURNAL knows that I am opposed to this reduction, and in this communication, which shall be my last on the subject, I intend to state as clearly as possible my reasons for my opposition.

I desire to assure the membership that, so far as I am concerned, there is no personal feeling between Mrs. Kennedy and I in this matter. We look at the question differently, that is all, and I credit her with the same motive that I claim for myself—the good and welfare of the International organization.

When the Woman's International Auxiliary to typographical union perfected its organization at Cincinnati in 1902, we had just $1.80 in the treasury. The trials and tribulations which the International officers experienced the first year in making the financial ends meet is well known to the membership, generally, and the story needs no repetition here. The first year our total receipts were $169.60 and the expenditures $133.52, leaving a cash balance on hand of $36.08.

The second year the receipts, including the $36.08 cash balance from previous year, were $533.21, expenditures $305.51, supplies on hand $39.80, leaving a cash balance of $187.90.

This year, up to June first the receipts were $617.80, last year's balance $187.90, our expenditures have been $315.18, leaving a balance of $490.52. At a rough estimate there will remain in the treasury at the time of the convention, counting outstanding bills, etc., about $500. This balance, of course, includes moneys received for charters, supplies, etc.

The membership should not lose sight of the fact that the convention expenses of the International president and secretary are not included in the above statement. The first year Omaha and Cincinnati auxiliaries paid our expenses. The second year we succeeded in getting to St. Louis by means of the celebrated $5 assessment, and this year we expect to make the round trip to Toronto by assessing each member 20 cents.

Mrs. Kennedy is mistaken in her assertion that the tax was doubled at St. Louis, because the assessment was made for expenses last year, in addition to the tax.

The fact in the case is that the only material increase in the per capita tax is the 5 cents a quarter, and this was put on that the secretary-treasurer, who, if she attends to her duties, works more hours than the average office girl, might be paid the enormous sum of $156 a year. In discussing the reduction of the tax, the 20-cent assessment for officers' expenses will have to be taken into consideration. This expense will have to be met each year in addition to the per capita tax, if it is put at 10 cents per quarter, and I "for the life of me," can't see the difference it makes to us at the end of the year whether we pay it as a tax or as an assessment. The truth is, it is harder to pay 20 cents all at once than it is 5 cents every three months, to say nothing about the time and trouble it causes local secretaries, and the considerable extra work for the International secretary, the extra expense and the feeling that the International officers are standing in the light of beggars. June 1, 1905, we had a total membership in the International organization of 1,046.

With the tax at 40 cents a year and the 20-cent assessment added, each member would pay 60 cents a year. Per capita tax at 60 cents on 1,046 members, $627.60.

Secretary's salary	$156 00
Officers' expenses, about	200 00
Running expenses (estimated)	350 00
Total	$706 00

The actual expenses of the International organization (and we have been economical to a fault) the second year, counting supplies on hand, were $345.31.

This year the expense will be over $300, and we have spent almost nothing in booming the organization and trying to get new auxiliaries. Take $706 from $627 if you can, and what are you going to do to make up the deficit? Levy another assessment?

In my judgment, if there is to be a cut anywhere, it should come off the $10 per day allowed the International officers. First-class railway and sleeping accommodations and meals, if the trip be a long one, should surely be allowed them. In addition to this the allowance for expenses during convention week should be a stipulated amount, enough to allow them to stop at the official hotel, and maintain the dignity of the organization.

Within the next year it may be possible that our organization will be called upon to assist in the fight for the eight-hour day. The members of the typographical union are paying one-half of 1 per cent on their gross earnings to create a defense fund, and are doing it willingly. We, who are prone to boast that we are an auxiliary to the grandest union ever organized, are asked to "kick" on paying a "measly" 80 cents a year for fear that we might create a defense fund of our own.

It has been my observation that those members who are eternally objecting to the tax, and who have to be continually run after each quarter to get them to pay, never have and never will do the organization any good, and it is only a question of a short time until we will lose them, even if the tax was 5 cents a quarter. What, may I ask, can the International Auxiliary hope to accomplish in the way of assisting the typographical union with an empty treasury? Did the membership ever take into consideration that the next year may be a busy one for us, and that our little $500 balance, which we have accumulated after three years of hard struggle and counting the pennies, might not last longer in 1906 than a June frost?

This is not the time for bargain-counter arguments or cheap propositions. In the language of a well-known editor, I want to see the auxiliary on the "firing line" in 1906 if necessary. We have been bragging for the past three years what we would do to help the union in time of trouble. We may be called upon to "make good" in the near future. In the face of these facts, is the membership willing to deplete the treasury? I hope not.

Up to June 10 we have received the following list of delegates to the convention to be held at Toronto:

1, Atlanta—Mrs. W. E. Jones.
2, Omaha—Mrs. Bert Cox.
3, Milwaukee—Mrs. Frank Engel.
4, Cincinnati—Mrs. William Ogden.
5, Indianapolis—Mrs. E. J. Heaton.
7, Nashville—Mrs. J. A. Aul.
9, Minneapolis—Mrs. A. Olson.
11, Lincoln—Mrs. H. W. Smith.
12, Louisville—Mrs. J. D. Kane.
13, Washington, D. C.—Mrs. A. W. Bowen.
21, Chattanooga—Mrs. D. B. Barnes.
25, Bradford, Pa.—Mrs. Frank B. Carr.
29, St. Louis—Mrs. George B. Woods.
33, Spokane—Mrs. Lue Laumer.
35, Syracuse—Mrs. Mary Stanton.
41, Chicago—Mrs. Harry Atkinson.
42, Toronto—Mrs. D. McDougall.

In a recent letter from Mrs. McDougall, president of the Toronto Auxiliary, she says that the climate in that city in August is about the same as it is at Cincinnati, but that the nights are cool. We merely mention this for the information of our members who expect to attend the convention, and who are now engaged in fixing over their old clothes. MRS. ED D. DONNELL.

CHICAGO, ILL.

And behold, there was great strife in the city, and the hewers of wood and the carriers of merchandise did revolt, and all the artisans of that place were exceeding wroth.

Then did the followers of Gutenburg go unto their own houses and say unto their women: "Go not into the market-place to trade, neither barter thou in any way with the oppressor, but guard thou thy shekels, unto the day that the typothetæ are upon us."

So the women were no more seen in the market-place, but did abide in their own houses turning their sleeves upside down so as to make themselves fair unto their lords.

And the great strife grew and continued even unto the third month, and the guards of the city did carry merchandise and lumber. And did have no time to overtake the plunderer. Verily I say unto you this is rough. Selah!

This month finds us all well and preparing our summer outings. Our committee promises much.

The secretary of No. 41 had the great pleasure of calling on Mrs. Ed Donnell, our International secretary, and the warm greeting and entertainment received will long be remembered.

Our auxiliary has not acted yet, on the per capita tax issue, but I hope to have something to say on that soon, in the meanwhile do not let us strain at a gnat. Personally, I deplore assessments, and think all International dues should be consolidated and by quarterly payments brought within reach of all. We hear no complaint about the per capita tax, but with the assessment it is different. I trust we will all consider well before we act. MRS. GILBERT R. JONES.

DES MOINES, IOWA.

Auxiliary No. 15 gave a card party in April at the home of Mrs. O'Bleness, and nine fine prizes were awarded to highest scores.

On May 12 Mrs. Corbin entertained most delightfully at her home, and two applications for membership were read, and one lady received the pledge.

No. 15 feels encouraged with its growth in membership, as at each meeting applications are received.

A new union man arrived in Des Moines early in March and is making his home at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Boniface; he has been christened Charles Boniface. Mrs. Boniface is a member of No. 15. MRS. JACOBSEN.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.

Woman's Auxiliary No. 5 held its first meeting in its new hall in the Knights and Ladies of Honor building on Monday, June 5, at which there was a goodly attendance. While our organization has been of slow growth, its membership continues to increase, and two new members will be initiated at the July meeting.

Mrs. Heaton, president of No. 5, and delegate-elect to the Toronto convention, entertained the members and their husbands at her suburban home in Irvington on the night of May 25. An enjoyable evening was spent by those present. An entertaining program of vocal and instrumental music was rendered by the ladies, assisted by some of the members of No. 1. During the course of the evening the hostess dispensed refreshments, both substantial and dainty, after which the party broke up, being compelled to leave much sooner than they desired, owing to the distance from the city, and the disinclination of the guests to "hoof" it home.

On Wednesday, June 14, the auxiliary held a bazar and social in their hall, which was well attended by the ladies, but at which the attendance of members of No. 1 was rather small. A very pleasant time was had by those who were present, and with returns from the sale of tickets and the many useful and ornamental articles sold and raffled, the ladies feel that when all accounts are balanced there will be a comfortable sum on the right side of the ledger.

Rumor has it that we are soon to be paid a visit by the secretary of the International Auxiliary. While Mrs. Donnell is no stranger to some of the ladies, there is a large proportion of our membership that have never had the pleasure of her acquaintance, and we are all looking forward with a great deal of satisfaction to her coming visit. In conclusion, I desire to urge Mrs. Donnell to hasten her visit to this "hustling" Auxiliary No. 5.

MRS. W. A. GREENE.

ST. PAUL, MINN.

The auxiliary gave a successful May ball at Litt's hall, on the 23d of the month. It was well attended and a most enjoyable time was given those who honored the ladies with their presence.

No. 44 will go on record as being opposed to any reduction of the International dues at the present time, and endorsed Mrs. Donnell's plan at the last meeting, instructing their representative to vote for the same at the convention.

At the last meeting of the auxiliary delegates to the label league were elected.

MRS. J. J. CAHILL.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.

Chattanooga Auxiliary to Typographical Union No. 89 held the June meeting with Mrs. E. L. Barrenger.

No. 21 will be represented at Toronto by one of our most enthusiastic far-seeing members; we have voted a neat little sum out of our treasury for our delegate, but fearing that would not be sufficient, we will give a social before time for Mrs. Barnes to leave.

There were some few important subjects brought before the meeting, but no action was taken, as No. 21 believes in going slow.

We adjourned at a late hour to meet with Mrs. J. R. Kemp, of Ridgedale. MRS. O. BLODGETT.

SEATTLE, WASH.

Woman's Auxiliary No. 23 held a card and ice cream social on May 30, which was enjoyed by a goodly number of our members and many outsiders. A short musical and recitative program was well rendered, while progressive whist completed the evening. At our last regular meeting held Thursday, June 8, two new members were initiated into the mysteries of No. 23. An outdoor picnic was proposed and will be held at one of our many beautiful resorts in the near future. Our next regular meeting will also be a social day; are planning something new. This auxiliary is in receipt of the International Typographical Union eight-hour button and we feel very important while wearing them.

Seattle now has formed what is to be known as the "Woman's International Union Label League," meetings to be held twice a month. The following named ladies are the officers: President, Mrs. G. O. Burdick; vice-president, Mrs. C. Esselbach; secretary, Mrs. Coleman; treasurer, Miss Lester; sergeant-at-arms, Mrs. H. Puttrich; guard, Mrs. R. Layton. The last meeting, held on June 1, was well attended, and representatives of labor organizations were present and talked upon matters pertaining to the league. At present we are meeting at the waitress' hall in this city, said hall being tendered us free of charge through the untiring efforts of Mr. Akers, of W. C. L. U. fame. Twenty-two members have been enrolled, and our next will be the fourth meeting. This little bunch of femininity is doing all in its power to advance the label, and it will succeed, too, soon as it gets beyond swaddling clothes. A 10-cent social, with refreshments is to soon materialize. Will let you know of this at proper time.

MRS. ROLAND LAYTON.

TORONTO, CANADA.

The June meeting of No. 91 was attended by a goodly number of the Toronto Woman's Auxiliary, and a most pleasant and instructive evening was spent. Fortunately, several of the orators of the craft were present, and no doubt their eloquence will be an inspiration to our membership to go and do likewise, so we have great expectations for the future on that line. We were also considerably enlightened as to the method and routine, and especially were we pleased with the gentlemanly and courteous conduct of the meeting, which certainly reflected credit upon the printers of this city. Nothing approaching coarseness was observable, which leads us to believe that this was not merely the case because ladies were present, but that the officers of No. 91 have determined that the conduct of all their meetings shall at all times be worthy of the place the craft should occupy among the world's toilers.

The weather was a little unpromising on the occasion of the trip to Niagara Falls, but a most enjoyable day was spent. It would be hard to find more beautiful surroundings anywhere than can be enjoyed in this sail from Toronto in a fine steamer of the Niagara Line across Lake Ontario, then up the broad waters of the river to the borders of the world-famed rapids, then taking the Gorge Railway, past the great whirlpool and the mountains of rushing waters, unfolding wonder after wonder of nature's grandeur, until at last the magnificent cataract of Niagara itself is reached, where one can spend many hours of inspiration and wonder amidst scenic grandeur that commands the admiration of the greatest, as well as the more humble visitors from all quarters. The members of the auxiliary have especially to thank two members of No. 91 for their kindness during the day. Mr. Stevenson and Mr. Martin were exceedingly kind, and the treatment the ladies received was most pleasant, and promises well for the reception which will be accorded to all visiting printers with their wives, sisters—and others' sisters—who come to the convention.

Any information required from the woman's auxiliary will be cheerfully furnished by Miss Meehan, 52 Phoebe street, or by our president, Mrs. McDougall, 47 Sullivan street, Toronto.

Correspondence

CHICAGO, ILL.

The announcement of the severe indisposition and final passing away of Adrian M. Jones was received with sorrow by his Chicago friends. Adrian had many genuine friendships here because of his kindly disposition and gentlemanly bearing. Those of a fraternal character were especially enjoyable, where his natural inner self shown with sunny brightness. Even his political opponents could find nothing against him except the making of sarcastic references to his Texas hat, gaudy neckties and softness of speech, all of which were simple peculiarities and not glaring faults. When in charge he was generous to a fault, and there are men in Chicago who always speak well of his indulgent nature. I wish my associations with every one were as pleasant and genial as those I enjoyed with Adrian.

The central district eight-hour conference, held in this city June 9 and 10, was a most important affair in more ways than one. In session as it was just at the time St. Louis made her sensational somersault, it gave an opportunity for the middle states representatives to voice their concerted opinion of that action and prepare ways and means for counteracting its effect. The printed proceedings, which will be scattered over the country far and wide, will give a concise account of the business transacted. Representatives from twenty-one unions were present, and the eight-hour spirit refused to be dampened by the intelligence President Lynch brought Friday morning. Encouraging reports were made on conditions throughout the territory represented, and a permanent organization was perfected, with E. R. Wright, of Chicago, reelected president, and Frank Kochman, of Cincinnati, continued as secretary-treasurer. The eight-hour spirit was of a determined and insistent quality, and the reports from St. Louis cemented and solidified the delegates to a remarkable degree, by showing the necessity of compact organization to guard against our foes. The delegates composed as creditable a body of deliberative character as I ever saw, and the display of interest and commendable realization of the work in hand goes a long way toward removing the stigma of flippancy and conviviality attached to conventions of this kind. The unions of the middle west have reason to feel proud of the businesslike ability of their representatives.

No. 16 gave a stag party in honor of the delegates, which in point of attendance and exuberant hilarity was the equal of last year. President Lynch attended, and was easily recognized by that peculiarly benign expression depicted on that expansive physiognomy. Secretary Bramwood made a flying trip from Indianapolis to be present, and made one of his telling and pointed talks on the situation. Billy Spires also added the presence of his effulgent smile. It is worth the price of admission alone to meet old friends and acquaintances at these gatherings.

The percentage system of collecting dues received another black eye at the late election, but its adherents can congratulate themselves that they have made progress. Last year the proposed change was floored by a negative vote of 559, while this year the opposition dwindled down to twenty-two votes. If the change in sentiment continues for another year in the same direction the percentage system will be carried by a safe majority and then be given a fair trial. At the end of another year the membership will, by actual experience, be able to give at least an intelligent expression of opinion as to the desirability of that method in collecting dues.

The man who forgets his obligation and continually hammers the union and its policy—one or two cases have recently been noted among the membership of No. 16—must have a curious conception of the affinity he bears to his fellow craftsmen. One can imagine the uproar a reasonably healthy stomach would create by subsistence on a steady diet of olives and sour milk, but when the pessimistic individual so far forgets the benefits, present and prospective, of wholesome, dyed-in-the-wool unionism and indulges in silly denunciation of the organization that has placed him in a commanding position, it shows the need of heroic treatment. He should be summoned before the executive officers and made to repeat the obligation a few times by way of remembrance, and sent on his way rejoicing over his new light. When a man begins to think he is better than his union, he becomes dangerous and will bear watching. If the union is too cramped and narrow for his peculiar talents there is no objection to his seeking higher altitudes, but he should not endeavor to free himself by tearing down the power that has been the means of placing him in the independent position he thinks he occupies. No one can safely assume that all organized labor is wrong and he only right. If he sees the need of improvement, he should take a little time to direct his efforts for reform at the proper seat of the disease, and not waste his ammunition in delivering volleys of invectives at long distance range, which at best only result in aggravating the situation and have no effect in securing improvement inside the union.

There is a growing sentiment that this city will sooner or later be compelled to resort to the caucus as a means of launching candidates for office. The city is growing so big and the printing interests are so widely scattered that a centralization of effort is considered by some as a necessity in the conduct of elections. Whether it would be a wise move or not is a question of polygonal proportions. It would draw party lines closely and might create factions in open warfare that would unearth questionable methods in attaining their ends. Those methods are used now to some extent, but the Kilkenny-cat tactics are so mixed up with every one in the whirlpool that one hardly knows whether he is among friends or foes. Rumored combinations are made and busted, and the wrangle usually resolves itself into a case of every one for himself and the devil take the hindermost.

One of the imperative and necessary duties of the hour is a strict and loyal adherence to the constitution and by-laws of the International Typographical Union and also the local laws. That carries with it a necessary loyalty to the officers, both International and local. The most successful military and naval maneuvers are those that have been laid out by officers in charge, and carried through with precision and exactitude by those given the work to do. I recently heard the question asked as to what should be done if an employer insisted on placing a non-union man at work in order to demonstrate the open office idea. If the new man refused to apply for a card, would the chapel be justified in stopping work at once? The constitution and by-laws will answer that question decisively. Hasty and ill-timed action precipitated by chapels or unions, without consultation with executive officers of either local or International character, should certainly be avoided. The officers have the right to be made acquainted with conditions and suggest the remedy. As well might a company or battalion of an army start off on an independent movement on the impulse of the moment, thereby inviting chaos, disaster and possible annihilation. A union elects its executive officers and committees with a view to contingencies of that character. They should be advised and consulted as to any situation that may arise with the same degree of confidence that their election to responsible positions would seem to inspire.

Information was recently received from Minneapolis that three or four linotypes had been shipped to Chicago with an amount of secrecy that invited investigation. The machines were located in a room in the Grand Central depot in full operation, apparently for the instruction of non-union students, and, it is said, under the direction of a union man. A school for monotype operators is also in operation, and it is apparent the typothetæ are exerting all their energies to supply the demand for operators in case of trouble. These things are to be expected, but the possibility of making competent operators from raw material in the few months or possibly weeks of preparation remaining is so remote that those who spent years in training for perfection as operators should not borrow trouble over the prospect. A half dozen machines will not produce many competent operators when the percentage of failures among those who try is taken into consideration.

The Franklin Union of Pressfeeders, which created such a hubbub in printing circles a couple of years ago during its strike, has been quietly working along reorganization lines and has made rapid progress. It will be heard from later. Incidentally, I hear that the pressfeeders, No. 52, which was organized under the care and instruction of the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union as a sure cure for Franklinism, has developed into a strong and lusty youth, with a few grievances of its own which it proposes to carry to the pressmen's convention at San Francisco to be aired. An official of Union No. 3 was recently heard expressing his disgust at the ingratitude of the new organization, inasmuch as it was proving to be as intractable, obstinate and unruly as the Franklins ever were in their palmiest days. All of which proves that human nature will crop out, no matter under what name it masquerades.

As an evidence of interest in the eight-hour movement, No. 16 voted an appropriation of $100 to aid Wisconsin printers in the work of organization. Chicago is not only thoroughly working the territory within her own borders, but is anxious to have other unions make a complete clean-up of all the available material within reach in contiguous territory.

Samuel Rastall and Richard Westlake, two old, tried and true-blue members of No. 16, leave Chicago June 27 for an extended trip to England and possibly the continent. It is fifty-four years since Rastall left his birthplace, Gloucestershire, England, and Westlake has not been 'ome in Devonshire for fifty-six years. The trip is laid out by way of St. Lawrence, intending to visit Paris and other cities, returning by way of the West Indies. They expect to be away at least two months. Mr. Rastall was the inventor of the Rastall system of type measurement, and if I remember correctly he also introduced the stamp method for keeping accounts so prevalent in typographical circles. 'Ere's 'oping you 'ave a good time, boys.

Eight-hour buttons are worn so universally by Chicago printers that the question is often asked by the uninitiated as to what the new organization is and what its purport may be. As a means of attracting the attention of the curious, the eight-hour button is a success.

The ex-delegates of this city held a meeting June 18 to perfect arrangements for the entertainment of Toronto-bound travelers passing through Chicago on the way to the convention. The reports of committees looking after the preliminaries indicate elaborate preparations for the amusement of those who arrive in time and have stop-over privileges. The date set for the festivities is the Thursday preceding the convention, and include an extensive automobile ride over interesting portions of the city in the afternoon, with a banquet in the evening, interspersed with attractive features. Other entertainment may be provided, the only drawback being the lack of time in which to enjoy them. The outlook is promising for the visitors, and Secretary McGowan is anxious to hear from all delegates, individually and collectively, so as to approximately determine the number that will be here. Circulars will be mailed, and replies and inquiries should be forwarded to the secretary, John M. McGowan, 192 North State street, third flat, Chicago.

As a prime illustration of hoodooism, it is said a proofreader on one of the morning papers is undergoing a boycott by the copyholders. One of his assistants committed suicide, another was recently taken to an insane asylum, and the balance of the copyholders are fighting shy. GEORGE J. KNOTT.

BOSTON, MASS.

The question of out-of-work benefits and old-age pensions is attracting more and more attention every day. The feeling is growing that we owe something to the men who have been steadfast unionists all their lives, who have helped to make possible the organization we have today, and who have paved the way to the higher rates of wages and the improved conditions of labor that we enjoy. We pride ourselves on the humanitarian work which the trade union movement is accomplishing, and we glory in that great monument to the International Typographical Union, the Union Printers' Home at Colorado Springs; but we overlook the fact that we have old members in our ranks who can not take advantage of the latter on account of family ties, and to whom the former has ceased to be a direct benefit because of their inability to work in some cases and inability to secure work on account of their age in others. In order to place our members beyond the reach of want in their old age, it would seem to be up to us to establish a fund for the purpose of paying a regular pension to those who are not in a position to support themselves. We should consider seriously and well this subject, because it is becoming a serious one; and it is one that should be considered not only from a sentimental standpoint, but also as a business proposition. What has placed the London Society of Compositors where it stands today? What has made the Cigarmakers' Union of Boston such a strong organization if it has not been its out-of-work, sick and old-age benefits? And if the cigarmakers, why not the printers? Such protection is well worth paying for. The fact must not be overlooked that our out-of-work members could secure work almost any time at less than the scale, but they refuse to lower the standard of wages by so doing, and in that way they not only uphold union principles, but they maintain the scale for the men who work. The establishment of such a fund would not only insure to every member protection against loss of employment, sickness and old age, but it would also confound trade union critics and commend us to the general public as an organization that not only can fight, but one which takes good care of its wounded as well. I am glad to see the interest manifested in this matter by other correspondents. It is a question that should, and I hope will, be widely discussed.

J. A. Calton, a well-known member of No. 13, has returned from the Home at Colorado Springs, where he went last December in poor health. He gained nineteen pounds in weight while at the Home, and looks well. He speaks in the highest terms of his treatment there, and of the institution as a haven of rest for the weary and diseased members of our craft. He tells me that "Biff" Smith, well known here, is in the hospital annex, and is a very sick man. "Biff" was sent to the Home from Winnipeg Union.

The meeting of "the employing printers of New England," held in Faneuil Hall, to which reference was made last month, was somewhat of a fizzle. They met, passed a resolution to resist the movement for the eight-hour day to the utmost, adjourned to supper, and it was all off. The meeting was not generally attended by Boston master printers, but was largely made up of out-of-town employers who must come to Boston every once in a while anyway, and the fare-and-a-third rate secured for the meeting gave them a good opportunity to see to their business, attend the session, get a free feed, and go on their way rejoicing. Less than four hundred attended, and by actual count ninety-seven went out before the vote on the eight-hour resolution was taken. Of those who voted for it, some are already on an eight-hour basis, and others are running union label shops and will grant the eight-hour day as soon as it is asked for. Label offices in Lowell and Lawrence were represented, and they will grant the eight-hour day as soon as the rest. Taken as a whole, the typothetæ had little real cause for self-congratulation over the outcome of the meeting of "the employing printers of New England."

In Chicago Mayor Dunne's work in connection with the municipal ownership of the traction system is progressing. Already some ten miles of traction lines are available for municipal ownership, and within two years' time there will be enough to make a large system, extending north and south about twenty miles and westward from the center of the city in various directions about ten miles. Mayor Dunne stands for the principle of public ownership and operation of public functions, and private ownership and operation of private business. The progress of the work in Chicago will be watched with interest by the rapidly growing number of believers in the principle of government ownership of public utilities the country over. But we must do something more than watch Chicago if we wish to profit by its example. We must do something. Talk it up.

Now, if C. W. Post, the new president of the Parryites, will only spend another $20,000 in advertising his slanderous utterances against the unions in the newspapers, it will not only put money into the pockets of union printers, but will also sound the death-knell of the union-wreckers' organization, and there would be no need of a Post-mortem to find out what it died of. Nothing will kill a damphool movement quicker than an exposition of its own damphoolishness. By the way, this means of advertising doesn't speak well for the boasted circulation of the Parry official organ. However, he may think he is accomplishing a double purpose, in that it also keeps this "martyr's" products before the general public. "There's a reason."

I had a very pleasant visit in June from W. D. B. Mitchell, of Springfield, who made the trip with the Boston delegates to the Birmingham convention in 1901. Mr. Mitchell was on his way to the Fall River convention of the New England allied trades, to which he was a delegate. He is a thoroughgoing union man, a worker, and a good talker, and I am glad to see that his union recognizes his worth.

The Boston Globe recently published a story of the life of William Grandison, the first colored man to become a member of a typographical union in this country. He joined Cambridge Union No.

61 in 1870, and became one of the most highly respected of its members, not only for his fidelity to union principles and his good workmanship, but for his modesty and gentlemanly conduct. He later became president of Norwood Typographical Union, and his son is a member of "Big Six" of New York. No. 13 has several colored members, and they are a credit to the craft, being intelligent printers and good workmen. Colored men must be admitted to membership in our unions, if their proofs are white.

Anticipating the advent of the Siegel department store in this city, I am told that some of the other stores are getting their employes to sign contracts until the first of the year, or else take a long summer vacation. They are probably profiting by the lesson taught by the advent of the American in this town, when it drew many of the best workmen in all departments from the other papers. This is also an instance where the individual contract works to the advantage of—the employer.

Secretary Sterling, of No. 13, who is a member of the Medford board of aldermen, secured the passage in that body last month, by a vote of 17 to 1, of an order for the municipal ownership of gas and electric light plants. This must be passed by a two-thirds vote of two successive boards, and then be acted on favorably by the people at a regular election. It is a long and devious course, but the demand for public ownership is growing.

Such meetings as that held by the "employing printers of New England," in opposition to the eight-hour day, should be answered by a rousing trades union mass meeting in Faneuil Hall, at which prominent men in the labor movement, as well as in public life, would be invited to speak. Our eight-hour committee should be up and doing. The time is getting short.

For the editor of a labor journal to deny the right of a newspaper to publish the facts about a "pure beer" court trial (which other papers did not dare to do), on the ground that the manufacturers of the beer did not advertise in said newspaper's columns, and then to question its consistency in accepting advertisements from said manufacturers, is ludicrous to the last degree.

The name of the defeated candidate for president of No. 13 was not "James W. Coughlin," as incorrectly stated in this correspondence last month, but James W. Cameron. I make this correction as an apology to Mr. Cameron.

P. L. O'Leary, of the American, one of the best-known and most highly respected printers in town, has accepted the position of assistant dramatic editor of the Herald. He intends to retain his membership in No. 13.

President Dooley, of the New England Allied Trades, accompanied by Financial Secretary Frank J. Boyle, of Portland Typographical Union No. 66, called on Boston friends on the way to the Fall River convention.

The Boston allied printing trades council is made up of fourteen unions, having a membership of 150 to 1,500 each. Fully $100,000 per week is paid to its members by employers.

Brother Knott, of Chicago, speaks of an attempt to amend their election law so as to select delegates to International conventions—two from the book and job side and two from the newspapers—and says it failed of passage. We have had such a law in force here for several years, and it has worked satisfactorily, and we have met none of the difficulties he enumerates. Any member employed in a book and job office or on a newspaper is eligible to represent his branch of the trade.

And just to think that "the esteemed" Kreiter didn't say whether he would join those ex-delegate "backcappers" at Toronto! He certainly has proven himself eligible.

Frank J. McGarrity, a well-known member of No. 13, had his arm broken in three places in an electric car accident May 23. He was taken to the city hospital.

P. J. Powers, of the city plant, formerly of the Transcript before the machines came, died May 25 of pneumonia.

A knocker is a fellow who says unpleasant things because it is the only way he can get his remarks noticed.

There are about seventy printing offices in Boston entitled to the use of the allied printing trades label.

Affairs in the Post chapel have assumed the aspect of an armed truce—until the July election.

Henry Lamar, of Wright & Potter's, died May 31 of pneumonia, aged seventy-seven years.

Cushing's Norwood Press has put in two more monotype machines, making six in all.

Baseball Note—Winter proved himself a good cold-weather pitcher this spring.

One more month, and then all aboard for Toronto.

Work slow, and prospects for the summer poor.

January 1 is only six months away.

HERBERT W. COOK.

THE PENSION SYSTEM AGAIN.

In the June JOURNAL, by a series of questions, I sought to bring to the attention of members the matter of a pension system for superannuated members in lieu of the Printers' Home. My opinion, of course, is strongly in favor of the proposition. I am confident such a system would strengthen (if there is necessity therefor) the loyalty of the membership, and have the effect of bringing into the organization every competent printer working at the trade in towns and cities, settling without effort the matter of organizing. Here in New York city the avidity with which positions in the police and fire departments are sought by the best men since the pension system was adopted is an example of the effect it would have upon our union.

It would be essential, in my opinion, that only the age qualification should permit the placing of a member on such a pension list. If disability from disease of any sort were to be a qualification, the fund would be open to all manner of graft. The local unions should be obliged to take care of their own sick, and there might be serious objection to the plan on that score, though with the old men taken care of, the locals would be better provided for, and would be better prepared to assist those ill from disease.

My questions of last month may be grouped under three heads: First—Figuring fifty-five years as the superannuated age, how many of the present membership of 40,000 would go on a pension list annually? Second—How much of a fund would be required to make an income sufficient to pay $20 per month to such superannuated? Third—The effect such a system would have on the membership, and would it be a better expenditure of money than maintaining a Home?

On the second head, I believe a satisfactory pension system could be instituted at the end of two years on the following plan:

Twelve monthly assessments at $1 (40,000 members) to create a fund	$480,000 00
Interest at 4 per cent on each monthly collection of this fund (assessment first year)	8,799 78
Interest at 4 per cent, second year	19,551 98
Total	$508,351 76

Also increase the per capita tax 15 cents per month permanently. This will give the following, to be added to the above fund:

Twenty-four monthly assessments and interest, 15c per month on 40,000 members ($6,000) at 4 per cent (receipts placed at interest as collected)	$147,767 80
Pension fund	508,351 76
Total	$656,119 56

After two years, accordingly, there would be an income annually from the 15-cent additional per capita and interest thereon of $73,320, and from interest on the fund at 4 per cent of $26,244, making a total of $99,564 annual income, which would, at $20 per month each, provide for about 400 pensioners.

These figures are with the Home still in operation. Should it be possible, under the deed of gift by George W. Childs ($10,000), and other gifts, to sell the Home and grounds, it would permit adding at least $100,000 to the fund. If its sale is not possible, it might be rented for $5,000 a year, its location making it desirable as a sanitarium or hotel. (The National Letter Carriers' Association, which is contemplating building a Home at Colorado Springs, might also consider a rental proposition.) In case of rental the pension income would be as follows:

Interest at 4 per cent on fund raised by twelve monthly assessments ($656,119.56)	$26,244 00
Amount (and interest thereon at 4 per cent) of permanent increase of 15c in per capita assessment	73,320 00
Present amount expended on maintenance of Home (approximately $5,000 per month, being a portion of the present 40c per capita)	60,000 00
Rent of Home	5,000 00
Total annual income	$164,564 00

Figuring $7,500 annually for pension board sittings, which would determine whether the applicants had met necessary qualifications (such as ten years on the active list, loyalty to the union, good standing, etc.), as well as surety bonds and increased salary to president and secretary-treasurer for supervising investment of the funds in bonds meeting the requirement of the state savings bank law—say, of New York state, which is rigid as to safety—the $157,064 remaining would provide for 654 superannuated members.

Naturally, the above figures are only approximate, inasmuch as it is not certain the membership of 40,000 would bring the amount from assessment and per capita estimated, and the cost of the machinery of the system might be much larger; but I believe the amount raised, even with a large decrease from the estimate made, would be sufficient, because a census of the membership would likely make the number to be taken care of less than 654. This belief is borne out by Secretary Bramwood placing the average age at death of our membership for 1904 at 45.5 years.

I would very much like to see expressions of opinion on the various angles of this subject. For instance:

Effect in benefiting organization.

Effect on loyalty.

Opposition average superannuated members have toward entering a home.

Personal observations as to whether the superannuated member with a home circle cares to leave it, and whether a home benefits a proper percentage of the aged.

Whether the average aged man would not prefer $10 a month outside the Home to $30 expended on him in it.

Whether the membership would care to stand twelve monthly assessments of $1 and a permanent monthly increase of 15 cents in per capita for superannuated insurance. CHARLES G. McCOY.

New York.

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.

John J. Dwyer, who has so ably conducted the office of financial secretary for years, was given a handsome complimentary vote for delegate to the Toronto convention. John is certainly deserving of the honor, for he has worked long and earnestly for the union, and has never asked for any other recognition.

In the passing away of Arthur E. Lovett, for many years treasurer of No. 233, the union has lost one of its stanchest members. But eulogies spoken when hearts are broken are empty things at best.

It was decided at the June meeting to give all members initiated in the future one of our International buttons. Very good idea. All of the members ought to wear our button.

At this writing, June 20, Organizer Kinskey and the scale committee are negotiating with the proprietors on our new scale. No trouble is expected, but it is certain that we will not get all we asked for.

To the writer it looks as if very little printing will be done here during convention week. Nearly every member of No. 233 has expressed his intention of going to Toronto.

Have you perfected your convention card design? GEORGE E. LOCK.

HIS BETE-NOIRE.

The Herald's mills were grinding fast
When the machinist before them passed;
He thought he had them on the run,
When came this yell from No. 1—

MACHINIST!

The letter "l" in channel "o,"
Quite often it was wont to go.
When this had been attended to
There 'rose this shout from No. 2—

MACHINIST!!

A twisted "mat" had urged the call,
A twisted "mat"—oh, that was all;
'Twas out at last, he laughed with glee—
The same old dirge from No. 3—

Machinist ! ! !

Incessantly he hears that shout,
It nearly drives his senses out,
So oft' to hear in accents shrill:
"Now won't you come and fix this mill?"

MACHINIST ! ! ! !

City of Mexico. L. P. ARTMAN.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Beriah Wilkins is dead, and union wage-earners in common with all citizens of Washington mourn his death with profound feeling. As editor and publisher of the Washington Post he was a generous employer, kind in consideration for those who mechanically helped him make the Post, and always mindful of their personal interests. He was ever ready to promote harmony between himself and his employes, and to that end he was quick to meet representatives of Columbia Union with a view of agreeing upon an equitable wage scale. He won the esteem of all who met him because of his consistent liberality to the unfortunate, and his friendship was highly prized. While his death was sudden, the end came in the belief that God called him from earth that He could the better carry out His plans. A grateful people condole in tender sympathy with the bereaved family. The Post chapel adopted suitable resolutions, and its floral tribute was a most beautiful piece. Crescent in shape, it showed the first page of the Post with nice effect. John Wilkins, oldest son of the deceased, will take his father's place, and, as he has many of his ways in mind, there is every reason to believe that he will carry out every policy of his parent.

Warner Denham, one of the best-known downtown printers, and one who is held in high esteem, has gone to Saranac Lake, N. Y., for a two months' outing. His associates on the Washington Post and his friends elsewhere are hopeful that the rest will be of much benefit.

The subordinate union which does not insist on an eight-hour day for next year hinders the success of the eight-hour proposition. It has been demonstrated repeatedly that the International comprises all unions, and so works out its affairs.

Success comes to all contentions when honestly and firmly contended for.

George Cristy, of Albany, big, strong and suave as ever, visited Washington for a few days early in June. He was returning from a western trip, having been to Denver in his travels. Mr. Cristy at one time worked in the government printing office, and marveled at the many improvements in the big shop. His many friends in the city had a warm hand for the big New Yorker.

The employing printer who was a member of the International Typographical Union will hardly array himself against the eight-hour proposition.

When a man works eight hours out of the twenty-four he knows that he has been a-working, and this applies to the employer as well as to the employe.

The water wagon is almost empty just now. It had a heavy load, but hot weather and baseball seems to have simply broken it down. However, the chances are that it will again be crowded.

Advices from New York are to the effect that an association of ex-delegates will shortly be formed in the big town. Sensible action.

Samuel Freeman has gone south.

But a few weeks and we will be in Toronto. Looks as though the attendance will be very large.

Whenever a subordinate union takes on the idea that it is greater than the International Typographical Union, it is highly essential that it be disciplined.

The United Typothetæ is raising a fund at the rate of 1 per cent on the mechanical pay roll of its members. And who will pay for all this assessment? The consumer, naturally.

Robert Smythe, who worked in the big printery some years ago, and who is now running a daily at Harrisonburg, Va., was in Washington recently. He looked prosperous.

Columbia Typographical voted against buying additional property in order to enlarge its headquarters.

An investigation of the government printing office is going on. Congressman Landis, of Indiana, who is chairman of the printing committee, made the statement that there was no scandal as to "graft," but certain conditions had to be rectified. A recent order, it is said, is that no reading matter should be taken into the office. As a result the morning paper is not read on Uncle Sam's time. A general probe of all departments is now going on, by the president's orders.

There can be no question as to the importance of the Toronto convention, and subordinate unions should, if possible, send delegates. The money will be well expended.

Mr. Ellis is giving himself much trouble in trying to induce employing printers not to listen to the contention of the International Typographical Union for an eight-hour day. Mr. Ellis and his companions will surely realize that their business will not wane if their employes work eight hours a day. They are wise men, and will quickly comprehend their error.

Business continues to be good on the newspapers.

The Pittsburg Dispatch duckpin bowlers came to Washington in June. They also went to Baltimore. They won one game out of three in Oystertown. "Jake" Statler was master of ceremonies in this city, and when the Smoky City fellows finished playing with the Post and the Star teams they had but one game to their credit, having beaten the Post men one game. While in Washington the Pittsburgers were the guests of the newspaper printers, and they were shown every place of interest.

President Berg appointed an eight-hour committee at the June meeting. T. C. Parsons, last year's delegate, is chairman. There are no drones on the committee.

Demotion in the big printery from the proofroom to the case embarrassed the unfortunate ones. They have the condolence of their friends, surely.

The Trades Unionist, published by T. M. Ring since the death of Mr. Patton, celebrated its tenth birthday with the issue of June 15.

JAMES MONROE KREITER.

Some weeks ago—too late, however, for me to file my rejoinder in the June JOURNAL—I received from my friend Sam P. West, of Boston, a page torn out of the May issue, in which a sentence I had written was underscored: "His wife, who is a printer, survives him," with this marginal criticism: "How can she be his wife when he is dead?" Prof. Edward B. Warman, who writes literary "Don'ts" for the Washington Post and other papers, recently said: "Don't say 'He left a widow and three children,' but 'He left a wife and three children.'" The professor never tells you why, but how. There has been a lot of unnecessary niceness about this expression, and I have never thought it was worth a moment of anybody's time. No one thinks of saying "She left a widower and three children," but a "husband," and that seems to be a parallel case. She was his wife at the time he left, if not afterward; and in my sentence that is criticized it is readily understood that "She who was his wife is a printer and she survives him." As I wrote it, it expresses the idea, and that is the principal office of language. I have never worried much over little technicalities that, after all, will not yield first cost on the amount of labor invested.

George A. Plummer, a compositor in the government printing office, died on May 26 of heart disease. His remains were conveyed to his old home at Minneapolis, whence he came here about four years ago. He was a quiet, modest, genial gentleman, much liked by his associates.

Albert K. Mundheim, assistant foreman of the sixth (Record) division of the government printing office, fell dead from heart failure at the New York end of the Brooklyn bridge on May 19, he having gone to that city to say good by to friends sailing for Europe. Mr. Mundheim, who was about forty-five years old, learned his trade in this city, where he had lived the greater portion of his life. He left a wife and five children, three almost grown.

The death of Adrian M. Jones in San Francisco last month occasioned much sorrow among his old friends in this city.

Mrs. Margaret J., wife of Charles Spencer, of the navy branch of the government printing office, died suddenly, of paralysis, on May 18. Her remains were interred at Pottsville, Pa., her old home.

Henry L. Davison, of the weather bureau printing office, died suddenly on May 20 at the advanced age of sixty-eight years. He was stricken on the street while on his way to work.

Harvey O. Carr, chief of police of Grand Rapids, Mich., an old printer and as good a union man as ever, was in attendance on the convention of the chiefs of police held in this city the latter part of May, of which association he is the secretary-treasurer.

Joseph E. Goodkey, a candidate for International Typographical Union delegate at the recent election, but who received the lowest vote, demanded a recount of the votes. This the union refused, whereupon he appealed to President James M. Lynch, who also denied his request.

George C. Christy, formerly of the government printing office, but for some years of the Albany state printing office, visited his old friends here about the first of June on his return from a trip to Denver and the west.

Robert B. Smythe, an old government printing office man, but now publishing a successful paper at Harrisonburg, Va., spent the last week in May in this city.

Paul J. Maas, labor editor of the Chicago Record-Herald, was in the city two or three weeks ago, spending his vacation.

There was an interesting debate between the orators of Georgetown University and those of George Washington University on May 27, the question being: "Resolved, That the open shop subserves the better interests of the laboring classes," on which the former took the affirmative and the latter the negative. The verdict of the judges was that the affirmative had failed to sustain their position. The Trades Unionist devoted a good deal of space to the debate.

The paperhangers won their recent strike here, and the lockout of the painters, which grew out of it, was declared off.

John Harrison, jr., a former government printing office compositor, died at Inlet, Hamilton county, N. Y., May 29, of tuberculosis, aged forty-six years.

Clyde J. Sheriff, of the government printing office, has gone to visit his friends in Seattle, where he will be for the month of July.

L. P. Kenney has been made assistant foreman to fill the position made vacant by the death of the late A. K. Mundheim.

H. D. Best, Lanston operator, has resigned to take a similar position at Nashville.

Alfred P. Marston, an assistant foreman of the government printing office, his duties being in the office of the foreman of printing, died at 1 o'clock on the morning of June 16 of pulmonary trouble, after a brief illness. He was president of Columbia Union in 1887 and an International Typographical Union delegate to the Detroit convention of 1878 and the Denver convention of 1889. He was born in Philadelphia, but learned his trade and lived most of his life in this city, being fifty-six years old at death. For many years he was a proofreader and copy editor. He was a member of Hope Lodge, F. A. A. M., and of the National Union Insurance Association. His family consisted of a wife and three children—a grown son and two young daughters.

Samuel F. Elwood, a compositor in the government printing office, died of cancer in Providence Hospital, in this city, on June 16, in the fortieth year of his age. He had been ill for some time, as is invariably the case with that terrible disease.

I want to say to Sachem Keating, of Toledo, that "Banzai!" (always write it with a begob mark!) may be the "insider's" quarterly password for all that I know. It's a good one, if it is.

A proposition to purchase additional property for an enlargement of Columbia Union's typographical temple was voted down by a referendum vote—938 to 366. It's just such things that make me 'spise referendum votes.

Tom Lawler, whose candidacy I mentioned last month, received the democratic nomination for prothonotary of—well, the county that Sunbury, Pa., is in. I'll bet he will make a hustling campaign. He was vice-president of Columbia in 1893 and one of her delegates to Louisville in 1894, and what he knows of politics is a lot.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.

The union printers of Los Angeles are thoroughly alive to the importance of the eight-hour movement and the necessity of being prepared in order that success may be achieved. The local union has taken two long steps in the right direction. Through its assistance the allied printing trades council has placed a business agent in the field, and the union itself has placed its secretary-treasurer upon permanent salary and requires him to devote full time to the duties of the office. With Business Agent W. F. Howe, of the council, soliciting work for union offices, and Secretary G. W. Bowman soliciting applications from non-union printers, it is apparent that the union will be greatly strengthened before January 1 next, when the demand for the shorter day will be made. During the past month three offices have applied for the label, with the distinct understanding that the eight-hour day is to be inaugurated. In addition to this, applications for membership into the organization are unusually heavy.

Nor has Organizer T. D. Fennessy been idle. During the past week he has visited San Bernardino, Redlands, Riverside, Colton, Ontario and Pomona, and next week will visit Santa Ana, Orange, Anaheim and Whittier, in the interest of the eight-hour movement, urging upon the union printers in those towns the necessity of organizing the country printer. As a result of conferences with union members in San Bernardino, Redlands and Riverside, Organizer Fennessy has issued a call for a southern California eight-hour conference, to be held at the Labor Bureau, Los Angeles, Sunday, July 16, at 1 o'clock P. M. The unions at Bakersfield, Long Beach-San Pedro, Los Angeles, Pasadena, Redlands, Riverside, San Bernardino, San Diego, Santa Ana and Santa Barbara each has been invited to send two delegates to this conference, the purpose of which is to determine upon a plan of action, to the end that unity may prevail throughout southern California. With one exception, Organizer Fennessy reports the craft in good condition in the organized towns, and that, with concerted effort, the printers in the smaller towns can be gathered into the fold.

The fact that the Los Angeles Union is engaged in one of the hardest fights to which any subordinate union ever has been subjected does not in the least diminish its enthusiasm for the eight-hour day for job printers. Unless all signs fail, January 1 will find Los Angeles prepared. And half the battle is in being prepared.

For the first time since it installed machines (and it was among the first papers on the coast to do so), the Times now is setting all ad "guts" on machines, resulting in laying off twelve of "the faithful," who, while walking the streets, are beginning to believe that the Otis-Parry-Post guff about the nobility of the "independent workman" is a delusion and a snare. These old fellows have been turned out to starve, having no Union Printers' Home to which to apply for shelter. The mills of the gods grind slowly.

Fellow-unionists, a great work awaits us—each and every one. The inauguration of the eight-hour day is a task worthy the efforts of any man. Only through concerted action can it be brought about. Knocking men who hold official positions in the union will not reduce the workday one second. Sneering at the members who do the disagreeable work and get all the blame will result in no good. Unity is the crying need of the hour. For the time being let us forget our differences, form into a solid phalanx and march shoulder to shoulder.

The eight-hour movement is bigger than any man and better than any set of men.

Southern California will do its duty.

WISCONSIN UNIONS.

The officers of our union at Madison have requested me to communicate through The Journal the fact that No. 106 is yet "doing business at the old stand." I find that since having been stirred up and having reduced the initiation fee under a declaration of amnesty, this number has received and acted upon many applications. However, the conditions in the capital city are peculiar, and the union has not many more members on its list than it had at my first visit in March. During the legislative session many printers from nearby hamlets have "blown in" on account of the extra work, and most of these have gone out to other fields with a traveling card in their clothes. The indications are that, with an occasional bit of encouragement, No. 106 will in time become all that it should be, notwithstanding the present lukewarmness of several of its members. The few "hustlers" see a hard fight in front of them, but they want the eight-hour day and the card shop.

As a special representative of the International Typographical Union, I have this week succeeded in having the hours of labor in the Banta job shop at Menasha (No. 612) reduced from ten to nine, with a part promise that better may be done in the future, even though the manager refused absolutely to deal with me or with the local officers. The six members there came near striking on their own initiative, and the two lady members were not a bit slower than their brothers.

Fond du Lac (No. 31) has an extremely hard row to hoe, and the placing of this union in proper shape will take strenuous efforts. Oshkosh (No. 211) is A1, 100 per cent to the good, and will assist No. 31.

Eau Claire and Chippewa Falls (No. 530) is a "dead one," and the coming week will show whether or not it can be resuscitated.

All over this state there is need of more label agitation. F. E. NEUMANN.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.

Organizer R. F. Radley, of Dallas, Texas, paid us a visit the latter part of May. He was on a three weeks' tour of the twin territories, encouraging the weak ones and organizing the nonmember country printer. His work in our immediate vicinity will result in much good to No. 283.

Election of officers resulted as follows: President, W. H. Martin; vice-president, O. C. Wilson; secretary, W. M. Anderson; treasurer, Miss Josephine Coffin; executive committee, Charles Dougherty, Mont Powell, O. C. Wilson and M. Fabey.

One of our steady and faithful members and erstwhile secretary, W. E. Evans, drew his card this month. He doesn't expect to print, however, having engaged in other business.

O. C. Soots has also drawn his card and has gone on the road as traveling representative of the Daily Oklahoman.

A. C. Jackson and wife are taking a month's vacation and visiting relatives in Arkansas.

J. T. Highley, our popular ex-president, has taken a withdrawal card and embarked in the real estate business.

Charles Dougherty, our delegate to the Twin Territorial Federation of Labor convention at South McAlester this month, made a very interesting report at our last meeting.

The dull season seems to be with us at the present writing, although everybody seems to be "spacing out." W. H. MARTIN.

IT is conceded by economists that the former long day for labor, by which we do not mean the nine-hour day merely, but the much longer day which preceded it, caused a limitation of output through its moral and physical injury to workingmen. The long day by no means meant a long output, nor did it mean the highest excellence of the product. As the day was shortened a distinct economic gain appeared and, of more importance, there was a gain in the physique and the morale of labor. We believe there is no dispute of these results of a shorter day. All systems go to judgment on their results, their effect upon the welfare of man. Hence it is that the short day is affirmed and that it has come to stay.—San Francisco Call.

The accompanying cut is a true likeness of James L. ("Tobe") Heizer, a member of Charleston Typographical Union No. 146, and at present secretary of the trades assembly of Charleston, W. Va., and who now holds the position of printing and stationery clerk in the office of the secretary of state of West Virginia, which appointment meets with the hearty approval of all the organized industrial trades in the community where he resides, together with an innumerable host of our citizenship who are not allied with any particular labor organization.

Some months ago THE JOURNAL, in commenting upon the appointment of a member of our union to a position under Governor White's administration, very kindly stated that "Governor White knew where to go for a good thing" (No. 146). I would beg to remind you that the secretary of state, Hon. C. W. Swisher, was in this instance prompted by the same foresightedness that characterized Governor White, and has drawn upon Charleston Typographical Union No. 146 for just such a man as he wanted, and secured the services of one who is in every way adapted and peculiarly fitted for the responsible position in the personage of Mr. Heizer, much to the gratification of the membership of No. 146 and the hosts of other friends and admirers of "Tobe," who know that the "mantle has fallen on worthy shoulders." Last, but not least, "Tobe" insists on the "little joker" (label) on all the printing. A. D. BUTTS.

TOLEDO, OHIO.

In passing, it is a pleasure to note that the eight-hour campaign is not conducted on a mere platform of sentiment. It is simply a righteous demand commensurate for service rendered. The eight-hour day at this time is an absolute necessity both to the employer and employe. While all of the several branches of the printing industry have kept abreast of the march and method of production of today, same can not be said of the job branch. This will be as readily agreed to by the employers as by the men. Leaving aside all issues, moral, sentimental and financial, and confining ourselves to the higher court, then on what rests our argument?

The job printer is the hardest worked and most poorly paid craftsman in America today—basing hours served and precision exacted. He not only has to comply with the usual code of ethics which go toward the making of the efficient craftsman, concerning the knowledge of types, borders and rules, but he must conform to the standard of competence as scheduled by the business office. This scale of competence as insisted upon by the business office is that jobmen must not only be able to assemble the interchangeable messengers of thought in artistic harmony, properly balanced with accompanying flubdubs, but he must be able to tell why he has produced such a design. He must be able to know the several combinations and contrasts of types with stock and ink used. All of such requisites occupy considerable time and study outside of regular hours of employment, and this knowledge the average employer receives and pays nothing for.

Employment in the average jobroom today is a nerve and health racking occupation to work at for nine continuous hours, week in and week out. It is not what is demanded of one within the shop that tells upon your physical construction, but the thought and study one must undergo outside the shop, in his endeavor to plan, design and have one's work "stick out" as demanded by the business office. All of this planning and study is done after working hours, as the employe has little or no time to work out details once the job copy is handed to him, and conform to the system of time slips, clocks and other exactions of the counting room.

Job and book printing are on a higher plane today than a decade ago. The public demands more art. The jobman, in order to retain his position, must be able to supply this demand. The employer is paid for this, but what of the workman who has provided the goods? He who, to meet the requirements of his daily toil, must keep in touch with the art productions of the day and subscribe to the several art technical publications, analyze the numerous so-called specimens and be able on a rush order to produce a high-grade conception. Today the jobroom employers do not, when in need of help, advertise for "job hands." They advertise for typographical "architects."

Employers would be guaranteed more faithful, efficient and serviceable help under the eight-hour workday than now, as owing to the shorter workday on newspapers the best help of the jobroom usually seeks better conditions, and the shorter hours of the newsroom appeal strongly to closely confined jobmen. A point at issue is that it is invariably the result that after a job foreman has taken time, trouble and pains to instruct a workman in the prevailing style of good workmanship, he is in the end attracted to the newsroom ad alley owing to the shorter hours. In the average job office it's a case of rush all the time. During the busy season only enough help is put on to meet requirements of copy in sight, while in the dull season help is reduced accordingly and, whether a volume of orders or not, the jobman has to undergo the same nerve-racking strain in the dull season as when busy. In fact the jobroom employe has to work as hard and faithfully for nine consecutive hours as do the ad alley men during the so-called rush hours.

Give the job printers a shorter workday; they certainly deserve it.

Labor Commissioner Stafford, of California, in a letter to state headquarters, makes the following statement:

I believe that if the public generally knew the enormous amount of life insurance paid annually by the unions, together with the benefits paid in cash along other lines, they would realize that the destruction of labor organizations, from a financial standpoint alone, would be a national calamity.

For the past few months a series of Sunday night (experience) meetings have been held at Central Labor Union hall, under the auspices of the local socialist party. Every phase and theme of economic thought has been discoursed upon and speakers from every walk of life have been invited and have had their say on the only real live issue before the American people today—the economic problem. Of the several speakers on such occasions, none surprised the trades unionists more than the declarations of Adam Schauss, independent councilman-at-large, and for whom the workingmen bellowed themselves hoarse at the last election; also, Frank Mulholland, attorney for the International Association of Machinists. Mr. Schauss stated that "he could conceive of no worse system of tyranny than that practiced by trades unions," while Mr. Mulholland emphatically proclaimed "that in every instance where the militia has been called out in time of a strike the union men were to blame." One by one the roses fall.

A good mixer is all right in politics or a bakeshop, but woefully out of place in the printshop.

One would think that the apex of the advertising problem had been reached when a patent medicine manufacturer exploits the medicinal properties of a dyspepsia remedy on the napkins used by the quick lunch concerns.

It is the opinion of one of the foremost artists in the west, who has spent most of his business life in New York, that in ten years color work will be so prevalent in advertising that the printer who doesn't understand colors will be left behind. Another point in favor of the shorter workday for jobmen.

If all Toledoans visit Toronto who have to date so declared, several shops will have to suspend operations during convention week.

The society columns of the daily press are bulging over with "and every one worth mentioning" are rusticating on the lake shore. I'm still here—and you?

Jobmen are certainly deserving of a shorter workday. I worked in a jobroom for a number of years, and let me assure you I was kept pretty busy. It's a case of hurry to bed after your day's work that you may be able to hurry and get up in the morning. One gets tired of being whistled to work and whistled out, hurried to eat, hurried to work, hurried to supper and hurried to bed in order that he be able to hurry and get up again and hurry for another day. Boost for eight hours.

One soliloquy of the defeated candidate is the higher you are thrown the higher you bounce.

The twenty-second annual report of the Michigan Bureau of Labor states that Factory Inspector Burton was compelled to order better sanitary regulations in the Post gripenuts shop at Battle Creek. The inspector discovered an unwholesome condition prevailing there that menaced the health of the underpaid employes.

The News-Bee will shortly appear in a new dress of eight-point. It is also said that other changes along this line are under advisement and that the columns will be cut to twelve ems, which will allow the addition of one more column to the page. Should such a change be inaugurated it will of necessity affect the Times, which is issued from the same office.

The Sunday Times-Bee has been conducting a series of lay editorials treating with every theme of interest to those who think. Business Agent James P. Egan contributed an editorial entitled "The Salt of the Earth," which as per its title allowed of a broad discussion of the worker and what society as a whole was indebted to him.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

On the morning of our June meeting a registered letter was received from the Philadelphia Typothetæ as follows:

June 16, 1905.

Mr. A. D. Calvert, President Philadelphia Typographical Union No. 2:

DEAR SIR—By unanimous action the following motion was adopted by the typothetæ of Philadelphia at meeting held Friday, June 16, 1905:

"That the contract between the typothetæ of Philadelphia and Typographical Union No. 2, which expired on May 31, 1905, be renewed for a period of three or more years, and that a letter to this effect be sent to the executive officers of the Typographical Union, stating that the contract must be negotiated on or before June 20, 1905."

Yours very truly,

JOSEPH HAYS,
Recording Secretary.

In view of the great amount of talk that the employers' associations have indulged in regarding the suddenness with which demands of labor unions are sprung upon them, this is certainly refreshing. They give us three days in which to sign a three years' contract, the making of which would brand us as disloyal to our International organization and injure the interests of the entire craft throughout the United States and Canada. There is no doubt but that the action of the typothetæ was intended to stampede the members of No. 2, in view of the action of St. Louis Union in signing up a three years' contract. But they reckoned without their host. The reading of the communication had a contrary effect. Although the night was hot our members were decidedly cool in the presence of this bombshell, and after careful consideration and oratory marked by determination and fervor, the following resolutions were introduced by Shelby Smith and unanimously adopted by a rising vote:

Whereas, The typothetæ of Philadelphia, in their communication of June 16, 1905, have demanded of Typographical Union No. 2 action which, if taken, would place this union in direct opposition to the mandate of the International Typographical Union convention; and

Whereas, Typographical Union No. 2 has invariably and implicitly obeyed the lawful mandates of our International officers and the International laws; and

Whereas, This union has spent two years of effort and many thousands of dollars and is still expending great effort and large sums of money in an endeavor to unionize Philadelphia, with the distinct aim of enforcing the eight-hour day when the same shall be demanded in competing districts; and

Whereas, A compliance with the demands of the typothetæ at this time would constitute a base betrayal of the interests of sister unions; therefore, be it

Resolved, That the officers of the union and the organization committee be, and they are hereby directed, to notify the typothetæ that Typographical Union No. 2 declines, at this time, to enter into any agreement extending beyond January 1, 1906, which shall provide for a workday of more than eight hours; and

Resolved, That we heartily endorse the action of the International Typographical Union in its efforts to bring about the shorter workday, and that we pledge ourselves to return to our respective chapels and use our further efforts and influence to bring about such a system of organization as will compel every person working at the printing trades within the jurisdiction of Typographical Union No. 2, man or woman, to present a solid phalanx for the eight-hour workday on January 1, 1906.

One year has passed with the first of June since the inauguration of the strike against the Inquirer. How surprised the management must be, as they were under the impression that the strike would not last longer than six weeks, and so stated. But there was a miscalculation as to the calibre of the union men they were opposing, and now they realize what can be done by men who are driven to the wall by unfair and unjust conditions and have to fight in order to keep from being trampled upon by unscrupulous employers and having their sense of manhood made a mockery.

That satisfactory progress has been made during the continuance of this fight is self-evident. When the advertising contracts were renewed with the Inquirer a few months ago it was learned that they were taken at the old figures. This is most assuredly a sign of weakness, as heretofore it was claimed the price would have to be advanced on account of increased circulation. At the late renewal this was not mentioned. Another indication is the astounding manner in which the advertising patronage and circulation of some of the other papers is increasing, particularly the Ledger, which is once more making rapid strides toward the proud position of Philadelphia's greatest want ad newspaper. Nearly all this business has been taken from the Inquirer, which sorely feels the loss.

In its frantic efforts to save its depleting advertising patronage and circulation, everything known to the profession has been resorted to, but the Inquirer is still going down, while the expenses for running the paper are on the increase since the strike began one year ago.

There is every indication of success for the union in its fight for decent conditions in this city. Rumor has it that the proprietors of the other unfair newspapers are amazed at the valiant stand made by No. 2, and look on in trepidation at the bulldog manner in which we hang on to the Inquirer. Persistence like that displayed in Philadelphia is bound to reap its golden reward.

Congratulations from the membership of No. 2 are extended to ex-Philadelphians who were elected from adjacent cities to represent their unions at the International Typographical Union convention at Toronto, beginning August 14. Walter W. Bair was elected to represent Lancaster, while the same honor was conferred upon Harry De Gour at Reading, Pa.

It is strange how a nickname given to a man in a printing office will stick to him through life, and many persons never know that it is not the man's proper name. As an illustration, John W. Chaffer, of this union, in the late seventies was a member of the Boston Globe chapel, and got up a program for an amateur theatrical entertainment, and in the cast of characters appears Jessie Josslyn, whose right name was Herbert W. Josslyn, and, to show how tenacious are these pseudonyms, there appeared in the Boston letter in the June JOURNAL an item stating that Jesse Joslyn had been appointed superintendent of the Globe composing room. His Philadelphia friends were glad to hear of his advancement.

W. B. Fitzpatrick, who was assistant foreman of the Inquirer adroom before the strike at that office, and who was popular with the men, has left the city and is now located at Elkton, Md., where he has charge of the printing plant of W. H. Torbett. There is a weekly paper run in conjunction with the plant, and it was desirable to secure an all-around man, and with his experience as dramatic editor of the Graphic, a short-lived Philadelphia society paper, conducted by the millionaire A. J. Drexel Biddle, he is just the man for the place.

John Gill is home again. He was admitted to the Union Printers' Home about a year ago, and was in pretty bad shape when he left this city, and it was thought the change of climate would be beneficial, but this proved not to be the case, and, as he showed no improvement, he decided to come back to his native city.

Reform is the watchword in this city, and the political upheaval has been the most disastrous ever witnessed here. While the rulers of the city are eliminating graft in contracts for city work, it is hoped that those for printing will be included, and that the bids will be advertised for according to law, and then a union newspaper will have a show to secure a share. Heretofore the city advertising has fallen altogether into the hands of proprietors of unfair papers.

The usual dullness of the summer season is noticeable. About this time of the year a falling off in business, both in the newspaper and the book and job branches, is to be expected.

In reference to the item appearing in THE JOURNAL from Meriden, Conn., that strikebreakers were imported from this city, it was the general impression that the firm was unable to secure any printers from Philadelphia. Secretary Clayton received word from the secretary of Meriden Union that there was a strike there, and Philadelphians were warned against going. A sharp lookout was kept on the depots, and it was generally understood that no one went from here, and on this we were congratulating ourselves. There must be some mistake about this. JOHN MEADE.

NOTE—In connection with the action of No. 2, as given by Mr. Meade in his leading item, the following telegrams will prove of interest:

TELEGRAM FROM PRESIDENT CALVERT.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., June 17.

James M. Lynch, Indianapolis:

Just received registered letter reading: "Mr. A. D. Calvert, President Typographical Union No. 2—By unanimous action the following motion was adopted by the Typothetæ of Philadelphia at meeting held Friday, June 16: That the contract between the Typothetæ of Philadelphia and Typographical Union No. 2, which expired on May 31, 1905, be renewed for a period of three or more years, and that a letter to this effect be sent to the executive officers of the typographical union, stating that the contract must be negotiated on or before June 20, 1905. Yours very truly, Joseph Hays, Recording Secretary." Regular meeting of union tonight. Wire advice at once.

ALFRED D. CALVERT, President.

REPLY OF PRESIDENT LYNCH, FOR THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL.

INDIANAPOLIS, June 17, 1905.

Alfred D. Calvert, 512 Odd Fellows' Temple, Philadelphia, Pa.:

Letter you received from local typothetæ evidently part National Typothetæ scheme following up St. Louis incident. It is expected by St. Louis printers that illegal nine-hour contract will be repudiated at special meeting tomorrow. Contracts in Chicago and San Francisco expire this month. Philadelphia Union should stand firm for eight-hour day. If typothetæ forces trouble in Philadelphia or any other city prior to January 1, we will support union directly affected and urge other unions to strike in sympathy. No. 2 should adopt strong eight-hour resolutions at meeting tonight. Wire me action of union after tonight's meeting. Under no circumstances can No. 2 sign nine-hour contract extending beyond January first.

JAMES M. LYNCH,
For Executive Council.

ANSWER OF PRESIDENT CALVERT.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., June 17.

James M. Lynch, Newton Claypool Building, Indianapolis, Ind.:

Philadelphia in regular meeting unequivocally and unanimously agreed to stand by demand for eight-hour day. ALFRED D. CALVERT, President.

TORONTO, CAN.

Welcome!

The convention arrangements are now comparatively completed, and from every indication this promises to be the largest convention ever held in the history of the International Typographical Union.

There will be a reception of delegates and visitors at the Rossin House on Saturday, August 12, at 8 P. M.; also reception to the woman's auxiliary and lady visitors in the hotel parlors. Buffet lunch, music, distributing badges, souvenirs, etc.

On Sunday a trip to Hanlon's Point, where military band and vocal concerts will be held, etc.

Monday (Woman's Auxiliary Day)—Convention will convene in Labor Temple, Church street, at 9 A. M. Invocation and welcome addresses. In the afternoon, electric car ride around city, terminating with a garden party by the woman's auxiliary.

Tuesday—Photo day, etc.

Wednesday—Excursion to city of Hamilton and supper and dance at a summer resort.

Thursday (ex-Delegates' Day)—Moonlight excursion on palace steamer Chippewa, etc.

Friday (Visiting Day)—Normal school, Parliament buildings, etc.

Complete detailed circular will be mailed to all delegates as soon as delegate list is completed. Ex-delegates and visitors will be supplied on sending their addresses.

The attention of the delegates and those visiting the convention is called to the fact that the Niagara River Line steamers do not run on Sunday. Those desirous of stopping to view the falls should arrive there on Saturday and come over by the steamers which leave Lewiston every three hours; last boat at 8 P. M.

Hotel rates and railroad fare is given by Secretary Bramwood in another part of THE JOURNAL.

The impression has gone abroad that Toronto would be unable to entertain the delegates on Sunday, which is entirely erroneous. Toronto is not a wide-open town, but the committee has overcome a great many obstacles, and the trip to the island, along with the military bands, etc., will provide all that is desired.

A charter has been granted the Printers' Club, Limited, by the Ontario government. The inauguration of this social club under auspicious circumstances promises to the printers and allied tradesmen a convenient sojourning spot, where one can take his friends and spend a quiet hour in reading, bowling, billiards and other games. Credit is due those who have so persistently worked on the obtaining of the charter, and, with bright prospects and able management, this should eventually become one of the strongest social clubs of Toronto. G. A. Richards is acting secretary-treasurer, to whom applications for membership should be made. The writer is informed that the club intends to make all delegates and visitors to the convention honorary members during the week.

The elections are over, and the feeling of the membership was that the officers should not be changed during convention arrangements.

If you desire to get votes, never take the initiative on questions in the trade union movement. If the matter involved turns out successful, tell everybody you favored the action, but if a failure, why, you certainly knew it would be so.

There are several matters which the executive should deal with with a strong hand, namely, the revising of the chapel system of voting, separation of our sick fund from the union in proper, the condition of a number of small offices, and looking after those members who are in arrears.

The Labor Temple is now paying at the rate of 24 per cent per annum.

Are you a political trade unionist?

The rain gods were with us on the day of our excursion, but nevertheless a comfortable balance was on the right side of the ledger.

Vice-President Mulcahy was in town for a few days recently.

Well, I will meet you in Toronto along with 1999 others. JOHN CHINN.

65 Albany avenue, Toronto, Canada.

TIFFIN, OHIO.

This is the first appearance of any correspondence from No. 480 in THE JOURNAL since its organization four years ago; but we have not been lying dormant all these years. Silently but surely we have each month conducted our business, and are at all times working for the good and uplifting of the cause. No. 480 will stand united for the eight-hour workday on January 1, and although there may be a little trouble in one or two instances, no doubt they will be overcome. Our new scale will go into effect August 12.

Tuesday, June 12, Tiffin Union met with the Fostoria branch in that city. This was the first meeting held in our sister city, and marked the first anniversary of the affiliation of Fostoria with No. 480. Officers for the ensuing year were installed as follows: President, J. E. Dixon; vice-president, G. O. Sacksteder; secretary-treasurer, Ross Locke; recording secretary, William Utz; sergeant-at-arms, Charles Burger. A very interesting meeting was held, and the Tiffin delegation was highly elated with the outcome. After the meeting a pleasant surprise was sprung on the Tiffin typos by the Fostoria members in the form of an elaborate spread. On a large table were arrayed an abundance of everything that goes to make the printerman happy, and the way they made things disappear was good to behold. Locke says all the meetings should be held in Fostoria. The occasion was greatly enjoyed and appreciated by the Tiffin members, and will not be soon forgotten.

In Roscoe Carle unionism has a valiant champion. At the Fostoria meeting he presented No. 480 with a box of fragments, which the members enjoyed immensely. Mr. Carle is publisher and owner of the Fostoria Times. He was for the past two terms Seneca's representative in the state legislature, wherein he served his county faithfully and well. Mr. Carle has always been friendly to the union, and we appreciate the interest which he takes in our cause.

During the last month we mourned the loss of one of our fellow craftsmen. Russell L. Knapp died Tuesday, June 15, aged fifty-seven years. He is survived by a wife and three children, the eldest of whom, Orio M., is a member of No. 480, who has our sympathy in his bereavement. Mr. Knapp was president of the former Tiffin Union.

Tiffin and Fostoria Union has accepted the invitation of Findlay Union to participate in the Labor day celebration in that city, to be held next September. A circuit embracing Fostoria, Bowling Green, Findlay and Tiffin has been formed, and each year Labor day is celebrated in one of these cities, and the other cities go there to help make it successful.

Our delegate and alternate, Henry Brohl and Will Curtis, to the International convention at Toronto, will boost for next year's meeting to be held in Pittsburg.

Business has been booming here and in surrounding towns for two months past, and no idle printers are about. E. G. MYERS.

THE HARTFORD EIGHT-HOUR CONFERENCE.

On Thursday, June 15, 1905, a conference of the eight-hour committees of Connecticut and southern Massachusetts met in Hartford, and held a very enthusiastic meeting.

Delegates were present from Hartford, New Haven, Ansonia, New London, Meriden, Waterbury, Bridgeport, Springfield, and Organizer Charles T. Scott, of Boston.

Ex-President J. S. Bacon, of Hartford, made the welcome address. J. W. Van Houten, of New Haven, was elected president; Robert Tarring, of New London, vice-president, and S. T. Pfund, secretary; P. B. Gray, sergeant-at-arms.

President Van Houten then gave some very interesting remarks to the delegates, dwelling strongly upon the eight-hour movement.

Organizer Charles T. Scott was called upon to make some remarks. In part he said:

Above everything else at the present time the International Typographical Union is out for the eight-hour day, to be inaugurated throughout the country on January 1, 1906. We have repeatedly tried to secure a conference with the United Typothetæ of America in order that the shorter workday might be inaugurated without any friction and that it might be brought about along peaceful lines.

The president of the United Typothetæ seems to be under the impression that the membership of the International Typographical Union does not desire the eight-hour day. If the matter is not adjusted between the two organizations before January 1, 1906, he will be a greatly surprised individual. The eight-hour proposition was passed by a referendum vote, and it received the handsomest majority that any proposition ever received at the hands of the membership of the International Typographical Union. If the shorter workday can not be brought about in a peaceful way, then we will inaugurate it through a struggle, brought about by the unreasonableness of the employing printers in refusing to meet with us and settle the long standing question in a fair manner.

The committee on resolutions—J. G. Bacon, Hartford; Michael F. Shea, New Haven, and L. E. Atwater, of Springfield—presented the following resolutions, which were adopted:

Resolved, It is the sense of this body that the officers of the International Union and the officers of the United Typothetæ of America come together between now and January 1, 1906, and endeavor to arrive at some amicable adjustment of the question of an eight-hour day.

Resolved, We again urge on the typothetæ the desirability of a conference with the officers of the International Typographical Union, and express it as our opinion that the typothetæ will be held responsible for any friction, financial loss or cessation of work unless the typothetæ agrees to consult with the officers of the International Typographical Union and adjust any difficulties that may arise by putting the eight-hour day into effect January 1, 1906.

Resolved, That we, delegates from the unions of Connecticut and Massachusetts, place on record our determination to insist on an eight-hour workday after January 1, 1906.

Resolved, That we express our earnest desire to confer amicably with our employers to the end that a reduction of our hours of labor may be brought about without inconvenience or loss to them or us.

From reports of the delegates, the eight-hour movement is in a first-class condition.

A vote of thanks was extended to Organizer Scott for his able instructions to the delegates.

James H. Godkin, delegate to the Toronto convention, made some interesting remarks.

It was voted that the next meeting be held in New Haven in September, subject to the call of President Van Houten.

President E. H. Rathbun, of No. 127, also made some interesting remarks.

The delegates were instructed to report back to their locals to have the eight-hour committees organize in the suburban towns. Some of the delegates reported that such steps had already been taken with flattering success.

A vote of thanks was extended to Typographical Union No. 127 by all the delegates for its efforts in bringing about such a movement for the eight-hour committee of Connecticut and southern Massachusetts to assemble in one body.

GR-APE NUTS.

Being somewhat interested in the progress of Battle Creek's local, No. 429, I carefully read the article written by C. W. Post and published recently by newspapers throughout the country.

This is not the first of Mr. Post's tirades on labor unions. This article, as well as the previous ones, shows a decided lack of knowledge of unionism, as well as socialism, on the part of Mr. Post. It is probable Mr. Post has had a bad case of chronic anti-unionism, caused by associating with D. M. Parry and others of his class. We would advise him to try the great cure-all, postum cereal. This is a guaranteed cure.

The article should have our widest circulation. It is the greatest argument that he has yet written, for the strengthening of our unions. Here's hoping he writes many more of the same construction.

If Mr. Post wishes to discuss unionism or socialism he ought first to study the two questions. So far, his writings merely show ignorance and a waste of printer's ink. We would like to ask what Mr. Post has done that gives him the right to dictate to any free man. Mr. Post, nor a host of his followers, can never kill unionism, nor unions, as long as there is a free working man on earth. When we cease to be free workers, such freedom as only well organized unions can give us against such manufacturers of fake articles and humbugs as Mr. Post, our fair country will indeed be a pitiful habitation. We will be drinking cereals, eating grape-nuts, chewing other questionable mixtures, be in debt for our homes, and have to have a signed certificate from the lords and masters of creation to be able to get standing room in paradise, upon whose pearly gates there will undoubtedly be hung flaring posters—"The Road to Wellville."

If Post has the interest of the "public" at heart, as he claims, what argument can he give to show we do not need unions, a shorter day, better working conditions, and more of the necessities of life? Surely we have a right to exist above the level of the beasts. Work is no sign of degeneracy, although it seems to be more popular to work the "other fellow."

More abuse of unions has been published the last five years than ever before. Yet look at the statistics and see the wonderful increase made by them. This is the kind of abuse we need. Let there be more of it and we will continue to wax stronger. The open shop will be a has-been; our families will be enabled to enjoy life; surroundings will be bettered, and we will all be eager to live and enjoy the new condition of affairs.

Galveston, Texas. EDW. DEAN WALDRON.

THE "BRAINS" DEPARTMENT.

I have been amused of late by the occasional publication of printorial anecdotes in the reminiscence column of THE JOURNAL, and think they should be kept up. Many of the old-timers can furnish entertaining reading for the membership, and by a more frequent use of this department of THE JOURNAL would render valuable service to the younger generation of prints, by keeping alive the traditions of the craft. But there is one side of the business which has not yet been touched upon —the editorial, or "brains" department, as it is technically termed by old-timers. This department certainly furnishes its share of the sublimely ridiculous and supremely stupid, and it often has been, and still is, beyond my comprehension how in the world some men holding down desks in this department of our metropolitan dailies ever succeeded in breaking into their present positions, and then retaining them for any length of time. It must have been done burglariously, premeditatedly, with malice aforethought. It certainly has proven "against the peace and dignity" of the profession.

I well remember some years ago, while in Minneapolis, I was up against the real thing. A pie card, had I possessed one at that particular time, would have looked like a blue chip in a mining-camp faro bank game—worth its weight a thousand times in gold dust. I walked into the brains den of a morning paper in the above-named city and asked the night editor: "Is there any chance to hook on?" He looked at me for a moment and then asked what I meant by "hook on." I told him I was looking for work, and asked if there was any show on the telegraph desk, telling him I was a "press handler," and head writer. Well, what do you think that bunch of ignorance said? He told me that the "pressman would not be around until 12:30 A. M., and that he could be found in the basement." Out of pity for his rank stupidity I explained that a telegraph editor is termed a "press handler," to be more explicit, an "Associated Press man." He raised his glass-eyed countenance, and said:

"Why, I have never heard it called that before, and I've been here for eight months."

Think of it—eight months. Through these correspondence schools, ably aided by nature, the material composing the staffs of some of our metropolitan sheets is about as comprehensive and variegated a bunch of junk as one can find, when gazed upon from the viewpoint of an old-time printer, one who has set up real copy from a real editor.

Butte, Mont. W. H. ROBERTS.

WORCESTER, MASS.

The monthly circular issued by the Worcester Central Labor Union to affiliated locals this week contained the following item:

The matter of the eight-hour day for book and job compositors was brought before the meeting by Worcester Typographical Union delegates, who requested that members of affiliated locals use their influence in getting organizations to which they belong, and firms with which they do business, to have their printing done in union offices, thereby helping the cause which goes into effect January 1, 1906.

The June meeting was fairly well attended, considering the beautiful weather, which, as a rule, causes a small attendance. The resolution offered at the May meeting pertaining to admission of new members from July 1, 1905, to February 1, 1906, without paying initiation fees, was passed at this meeting, as well as other matters of importance.

Secretary W. P. Cantwell will start July 1 for an extended western trip of nine weeks. He will remain in Chicago some time and will go as far as Portland, Ore. Returning, he expects to reach Toronto during convention week.

During the month one of our members, Joseph H. Soullierre, of the Gazette chapel, suffered a terrible loss in the death of his young and beloved wife. Their life together had been of less than one year's duration, the deceased having succumbed to a disease from which she became blind only a few months after their marriage, and which eventually caused her death. Mr. Soullierre has the sincere sympathy of the entire membership in his sad bereavement.

No. 165 at its last meeting remembered one of its old past members, Barney McKenna, who is an inmate of the city farm, by a donation of $1, to be sent to him monthly during June, July and August.

The little bachelor fraternity in the Telegram composing room has lost one of its members. Frank H. Eastman, who for several years has been an eligible for the benedicts, Wednesday, June 7, joined them and took upon himself a life partner in the person of Miss Crocker, of Marva, Ill. The members of the chapel, wishing to do "the elegant," remembered their brother member and his bride with a handsome Morris chair. A telegram was sent by Chairman Nugent extending the congratulations of the chapel, which reached the young couple just after the ceremony had been performed.

E. E. Brownson, formerly in the Davis Press composing room, has started into business for himself at No. 50 Southbridge street.

Ex-Secretary John F. Duggan attended the convention of the New England allied printing trades at Fall River this week, and reported a very enthusiastic and successful meeting. Mr. Duggan was for some time treasurer of that organization, and although No. 165 has not been affiliated the past few years, he has attended, as a visitor, nearly every meeting.

"Andy" Duggan, of the Telegram composing room, is receiving congratulations galore over his recent appointment as foreman of the ad department. "Andy" has been connected with that department for fifteen years, and is thoroughly conversant with the duties to be performed, and has the best wishes of his associates.

The central labor union at its last meeting voted to hold its annual parade and field day on Labor Day. A committee of twenty delegates was appointed by President Carmody to perfect all arrangements. One of the principal suggestions made in connection with the occasion is a request that locals do away this year with the usual "smoke talks" after the parade, as in past years they have had a tendency to keep members from attending the field day sports, which this year promise to be the best ever held. At the first meeting of the committee eighteen of the twenty delegates were present, and much enthusiasm was manifested. One of the important committees—printing and advertising—will be presided over by Delegate Salters.

The Evening Post—the Saturday, June 17, issue—contained twenty pages, eight pages of which were devoted to the Boston Store "ad." In speaking of this ad the editor stated that it was the largest that has appeared in an evening paper on a Saturday. FREEMAN M. SALTUS.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

Bridgeport is 90 per cent organized, and No. 252 is making good progress financially and otherwise.

Charles Warner, machinist of the Evening Standard, has taken charge of the New Haven Leader. Mr. Warner has been one of the working forces of No. 252, and it is with regret that we part with him.

William Mallory has joined No. 252 and left the Evening Post, which has always been antagonistic to labor. By securing Mr. Mallory's application the executive committee has scored a victory over that paper. Mr. Mallory is now machinist of the Evening Standard.

Edward Bennetto has been elected delegate to the Toronto convention and John Warmingham alternate. The first union that Edward Bennetto joined was Toronto, and he says he wouldn't miss it. Mr. Warmingham says he will be in Toronto to greet Bennetto when he arrives.

"Bill" Hendricks arrived home safe from the convention held in Hartford, and has the complete minutes of the doings of that body, to be read at the next meeting.

The eight-hour committee is working hard, and while we do not anticipate much trouble here, the committee believes in putting its shoulders to the wheel now and "push it along to victory."

No. 252 has voted to send THE JOURNAL to all non-members in this vicinity for three months, and thereby enlighten them on the good work going on.

President James Coats has introduced a social feature at the meetings, and thereby expects to get the stay-at-homes to attend more regularly. President Coats called the meeting sharp at 8 o'clock, and in one hour from that time his gavel announced the end of business, and half an hour was spent in a way that is sure to bring out the "stay-at-homes." JOHN GAFFNEY.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

The demand of the local typothetæ to return to the nine-hour day is still to the fore. No. 21 decided at the May meeting to pass the request up to the executive council. The six daily papers of San Francisco came out editorially within one week in favor of a continuance of the eight-hour day. One paper has published two editorials, and all the articles will make excellent campaign literature for our International officers. The action of the press is the talk of the town. To have such unanimity in an industrial dispute is certainly remarkable. It shows conclusively that public sympathy is with us. Several of the weekly papers have come out in our favor, and the three central bodies—the labor council, the building trades council and the city front federation—have adopted strong resolutions in our support and have pledged both moral and financial backing. The citizens generally feel that the introduction of the shorter workday in the sane and business-like manner shown by both sides of the printing industry warrants the claims advanced by the unions. We are in the right, and "the right must prevail." The citizens' alliance is handling the fight for the typothetæ. At a meeting held a few days ago a prominent employing printer, a member in good standing of the typothetæ for years, was asked to leave the hall. The chairman stated that it was not a gathering of the typothetæ, but a meeting of the "Employing Printers and Affiliated Trades Association of San Francisco." Afterward the chairman stated that he was afraid "Mr. Barry (the employer) would stampede the meeting." No better confession of weakness could be presented, for the gentleman named is an earnest eight-hour advocate. And the chairman sent No. 21 a communication asking for a definite answer on or before June 20 to the demand for nine hours. The regular typothetæ letterhead was used, and it was signed by the president. The meeting was the one Mr. Barry was asked to retire from, all of which shows a surprising amount of duplicity. The citizens' alliance is advertising in St. Louis for competent printers to work in San Francisco on the open shop plan. We predict that No. 21 will continue working eight hours, notwithstanding that splendid sponsor for industrial equilibrium—the citizens' alliance! The majority of the employing printers are in favor of running along just as they are, and the "un-American and unlawful boycott" has worked overtime to induce signatures to appear on the longer day list.

There have been two deaths since the last letter. Frank S. Craig died on May 23, aged fifty-two years, and A. L. Assam, aged fifty-two, on June 11.

The unsettled state of the labor market warrants an earnest word of advice to leave San Francisco off the visiting list. Whatever the outcome of the hour agitation, our dull season is here, and the offices have been working overtime cleaning up the work. Consequently there will be a slump, never mind what comes. So, Mr. Tourist, please stay away if work is a necessary part of your diet.

The Mutual Aid Society's picnic will be numbered among the things of the past by the time these lines appear in print, but July 2 will certainly prove a red-letter day in printing circles.

Kirke La Shelle, the late theatrical manager and union printer, is survived in San Francisco by a brother—Oscar. The latter has the sympathy of his fellow craftsmen. Kirke's will shows that $5,000 was left his brother.

The printers here are preparing for the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union convention, which opens on June 19. The presence of the pressmen's international officers will be opportune, and the delegates and visitors will be heartily welcomed.

Eight hours is a fair day's work. We have tried it, and are anxious to see other unions gain the prize. WILL J. FRENCH.

NOTE.—It will not be out of place to chronicle the fact that the executive council of the International Typographical Union has assured No. 21 of financial support in its fight to retain the eight-hour day.—ED. JOURNAL.

TERRE HAUTE, IND.

No. 76 met Sunday, June 4, for the first time in the new hall, with a large attendance, and much business of importance received due attention. A representative of the recently organized pressmen's union addressed the meeting on the advisability of forming an allied trades council. President A. T. Murphy appointed a committee to meet with the pressmen and arrange the details.

Secretary J. S. Edmunds was instructed to secure the names of all printers in the surrounding towns not members of the union, and to correspond with them in the effort to secure their applications for membership. To aid in this matter the initiation fee was reduced to $2 for ninety days.

A committee on scale revision was appointed to work in conjunction with the executive committee and report on the question of changes in newspaper scale.

Argle N. Lett, a member of the Tribune-Gazette chapel, received the democratic nomination for councilman of the Third ward in the primary election held Tuesday, June 13. The election will be held in November.

John S. Edmunds, who represented this union at the eight-hour conference held in Chicago June 9 and 10, reports having had a delightful trip and believes much good was done. As a permanent organization was the outcome, he succeeded in having Terre Haute selected for the next meeting place.

A petition for a receiver for the Moore & Langen Printing Company was filed June 14 in the circuit court by Edwin O. Langen, a member of the firm. The petitioner set out that the business of the company has recently been largely increased and extended, and for a convenient adjustment of Langen's interest this course was decided upon.

BUTTE NEWSPAPER WRITERS.

Butte Newspaper Writers' Union No. 12 is now a year and a half old, and with its third semi-annual election of officers is entering upon a very prosperous era in its existence. It is the design to enforce all rules just as strictly and efficiently as is done in the case of a printers' union. President William Purnett, Organizer James Hogan and other officers of the local printers' union have shown much interest in the writers, and have given the new organization much needed aid, till now it can be confidently said that the writers' union is permanently on its feet. Glen L. Foster, who was one of the chief organizers and promoters of the Butte union, is now working on the Great Falls Tribune, but he still takes an active interest in the Butte organization as a full member, and attends the monthly meetings. Charles Copenharve has been elected a delegate and John McMurray as alternate to the Toronto convention.

CHARLES F. DEGELMAN.

PALESTINE, TEXAS.

At the last election of officers for No. 472 all of the old officers were re-elected unanimously.

When our members were called out of the Daily Visitor office, a few weeks ago, of course the union labels came with them, and as our city council two years ago declared that all city printing should bear the union label upon it, at the last council meeting, held last Monday night (June 12), the contract was awarded to the Daily Herald, which is the first time that bids were allowed to be made for it. Heretofore it has been handed to the Daily Visitor, and no other paper was allowed to even think of putting in a bid for it. It is a pretty juicy "take," I would judge, amounting to from $350 to $600 per year, which is so much for the union label. W. E. LANGSTON.

THE shorter workday has proven to be one of the best benefits as to longevity and the lowering of the percentage of deaths from the white plague that the organized cigarmakers in this country have yet received—a fact that every interest in this country should carefully consider before censuring the labor movement. We would thereby say that the cigarmaker who is advocating the further use of their blue label, works to live and does not live to work, as do the beasts of burden.—Employer and Employe.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH.

The state of the printing trade in this city is a direct menace to the betterment of conditions, not only in other Michigan cities, but in Chicago and the cities in neighboring states from which we obtain our printing. The printers here will have to wake up and better there condition. They owe it not only to themselves, but also to the printers and proprietors of the country at large. Prominent Adventists are laying plans to put in a large printing plant along the same lines as the old Review and Herald, and if anything is done it had better be done before this training school gets started.

The open shop which predominates in the different lines of industry throughout the city has proved to be anything but a success to either the manufacturers or the proprietors. While there have been few open ruptures, there is a continual bickering between the employers and employes, and the general tone of business has been bad.

C. W. Post, president of the Parry alliance, and other active anti-union manufacturers make their home in this city. The general opinion here is that the sudden acquisition of riches by Post has given him a bad case of swelled head, and that he now wishes to pose before the world as the leader of the manufacturing interests of the United States.

While Post is an extreme radical, who makes wild statements about trades unionism which, no doubt, will appear as ridiculous to him at some future date as they now do to others, his executive ability should not be underestimated. He has succeeded in convincing the public that a concoction of chopped-up dough mixed with molasses constitutes a health food, and has managed to accumulate a large fortune in a few years. However, fads come and go, and a business that depends almost entirely on advertising is apt to fade away and vanish entirely at any time. The idle health-food factories which girdle the city bear silent testimony to how fortunes have come and gone in a night.

It is difficult to see how Post proposes to benefit the United States, as a nation, by trying to impose impossible conditions upon organized labor. If he were successful in disrupting trade unions and establishing the open shop, it would only lower the standard of living by reducing the purchasing power of the laboring class, and thus partially destroy the home market, which is the largest consumer of the products of our manufacturers. If Post will look a little deeper into the subject he will see that organized labor is fighting his battles as well as its own. Imagine him trying to sell his health concoctions in a country where labor is entirely unorganized. Take Mexico for example, and consider how the doling out of a pittance by the moneyed interests to the great body of the workers of that country reduces their purchasing power, besides being a detriment to any great national advancement.

It is a strange fact that while the manufacturer's association has come out so strongly with printed statements against rowdyism of all kinds, the Chicago branch should import thugs, bullies and desperate characters from the surrounding country, besides the lowest negro element from the south, to take the places of the striking teamsters, if it wished to preserve law and order. Any city tolerating a branch of the Post-Parry association can, by looking at the Chicago situation, see what to expect in case of any labor dispute. As the world progresses differences on the labor question are apt to arise at any time, that can be adjusted much better by arbitration than by importing criminals to break the strike and turning a city into a state bordering on anarchy.

From a circular which appeared in Battle Creek recently it seems that a merchants' protective league has been formed in the city, to take measures against the stirring up of any more strife by C. W. Post. This may be the beginning of a national movement on the part of the conservative manufacturers and business men of the country to protect themselves against the extremely radical actions of the present manufacturers' association.

CHARLES DE BRUYN.

ATLANTA, GA.

The "eight-hour smoker," given by Atlanta Typographical Union No. 48 in compliment to the Georgia Federation of Labor at Turnverein Hall on the evening of June 22, passes into history as one of the greatest demonstrations of its kind ever held in the southeast. Invitations were extended to all labor unionists in the southeastern district to attend, and the large hall was filled to overflowing, it being estimated that fully two thousand people were present at the smoker. Speeches were made by Wade P. Harding, president of Atlanta Typographical Union No. 48; Jerome Jones, president of the Georgia Federation of Labor; James G. Woodward, mayor of Atlanta; J. B. Hewitt, president of the Atlanta Federation of Trades; W. C. Puckett, secretary-treasurer of the Georgia Federation of Labor, and John W. Hays, first vice-president of the International Typographical Union. Many prominent citizens and business men, who look with favor upon the labor movement, were present and also made speeches, in which they took occasion to commend the working people on their rapid growth and advancement along all lines, and promising to lend aid and encouragement to the printers in the promulgation of the eight-hour workday. Music was discoursed by a union orchestra and union "refreshments" were served to the multitude. Everywhere were in evidence eight-hour badges and eight-hour buttons, and eight-hour literature was distributed to all present. W. S. Wardlaw, chairman of the eight-hour committee, presided over the meeting.

The eight-hour campaign has begun in earnest in Atlanta. Everybody seems to have caught the enthusiasm and all are working together in harmony. The various organizations in the city are endorsing our position, and say they will do all in their power to help us win out.

The printing pressmen of Atlanta have submitted to the employing printers a new scale of prices, which calls for a healthy increase, and which will be put into effect January 15, 1906. With the eight-hour day for the printers scheduled for January 1, and the increased scale of the pressmen following a few days later, the employers will likely be "up against the real thing" should they prove arbitrary. We are of opinion, however, that they will take the sensible view.

The Georgia Federation of Labor met in annual convention in this city June 21 and was in session three days. Resolutions endorsing the printers' eight-hour movement were passed unanimously by the convention.

The Georgia legislature will convene the latter part of this month. An effort will again be made to secure the passage of the child-labor bill. Friends of the measure are more hopeful than ever of carrying it to a successful conclusion at this session.

John W. Hays, first vice-president of the International Typographical Union, has been sojourning among us for several days. With the assistance of local committees Mr. Hays has been doing some effective work in Atlanta, and things look exceedingly bright. Mr. Hays will make a tour of organization work in the southeast, and much good is bound to result from his conscientious labors. Mr. Hays has made a splendid impression on the printers of Atlanta.

The convention of the printers of the southeast will meet in Atlanta on August 28. All unions in the district are urged to have delegates present.

At its last meeting No. 48 decided to place the names of all members in good standing on the subscription list of the Journal of Labor. A press committee was appointed to conduct an "eight-hour department" in the local organ. The daily papers are also giving us all the publicity desired. Thus will eight-hour sentiment be crystallized.

Dan Barnes, the delegate-elect from Chattanooga, is an ex-president of No. 48. Mrs. Barnes was also elected as delegate to represent the woman's auxiliary.

Everybody singing the popular song composed by President Lynch, entitled "Organize."

COLUMBUS, GA.

The members of No. 220 are expressing the deepest regret over the death of Thomas Gilbert, which occurred here recently. He was one of the old school of printers who came to Columbus many years ago, carrying a union card from No. 6. He became an employer, yet his fellow feeling for those who worked at the case endeared him to all with whom he came in contact. At the time of his death he owned perhaps the best equipped shop south of Louisville, and was one of the largest employing printers in this section of the country. He was an honorary member of No. 220, and always greeted his employes more as companions than as an employer. There is not a printer in this city who does not feel that in the death of Mr. Gilbert he has sustained a distinct personal loss. No. 220 held a special meeting, and besides sending a handsome floral offering to rest upon the casket, decided to attend the funeral in a body, and passed resolutions of sorrow, which were ordered printed in this issue of THE JOURNAL.

THE JOURNAL is looked for each month by the membership in this city, and read and commented upon with the greatest interest and enthusiasm by all. The comments, however, are all to the good.

Work has been unusually good here for some time past and there has not been an idle man in town. In this connection will say that very few tourists pass this way, but when they do they can always secure work enough to give them a square meal and have enough left to pay their way to the next "water tank."

The eight-hour committee of No. 220 is hard at work. The members are all enthusiastically hopeful that the issue will be met and the desired result accomplished without the least friction.

The typographical union was the only organization to send a representative to the state federation of labor, which met in Atlanta on June 21. O. E. Barlow was elected as delegate and W. H. Barclay alternate.

W. H. BARCLAY.

SIOUX CITY, IOWA.

As one of the correspondents of THE JOURNAL, I have been asked by the entertainment committee of the Chicago Ex-Delegates' Association to make announcement to all delegates and ex-delegates passing through Chicago en route to the Toronto convention that if they will stop off on the Thursday preceding the convention they will be entertained and well repaid for their stop-over and attendance. As the Toronto convention opens on Monday, August 14, the date for the Chicago ex-delegates' social function will be Thursday, August 10. I know not just what particular line of sociability Chicago's disciples of Franklin intend to "shove forth," but I have a distinct recollection of a dozen years ago when the session of the International Typographical Union was in that city. It is one of the happy memories of that week's sojourn, and it gives me pleasure to say that Chicago's tribe of good fellows has become so habitually versatile in the fine art of delightful entertainment that it will be a distinct and irreparable loss for any delegate to the Toronto convention not to avail himself of the splendid opportunity.

I would rather go to bitter defeat for the eight-hour ensign than for any other cause for which I have ever fought as a union man. To paraphrase those immortal words, "I know not what course others may take, but as for me," give me eight hours or give me death. But we will never lose so just a cause. To go back to nine and ten hours is to forge the chains of our own slavery; if we go back to nine and ten hours, why not then soon to twelve and fourteen—yea, to oblivion? Stand up and be counted with the hosts of progress, with the hosts for humanity—and damned be he who is so cowardly as to first cry "Enough!"

Having observed the uselessness of state labor conventions adopting a multiplicity of resolutions on various subjects, all prefaced with many whereases, and usually occupying two or three columns of solid nonpareil, at the recent meeting of the Iowa State Federation of Labor at Council Bluffs I solicited and was accorded a place on the resolutions committee. It was my thought that if the resolutions could be sufficiently succinctly stated as to be encompassed in a half column of newspaper type they would be read universally, and not be left to die in the cold and little-resorted-to printed proceedings of the convention. I was sure I could do a world of good in this reform; but when the committee met there were many long-winded, high-sounding, superlatively-adjectived manuscript and typewritten documents awaiting our consideration. It was evident there were many members of the convention who thought they could write resolutions with a masterly style of diction, a fact which I do not deplore. But the committee could have eliminated the whereases and adjectives of doubtful limitations and brought them to a readable and reasonable scope. But I found that I was only one of that committee of nine, and they had their way. However, I will not despair. Some day I may have an opportunity to demonstrate the utility of my idea. As it is, those resolutions are peacefully and unmolestedly sleeping in the unshafted sepulchre of mediocrity.

To one who has never attended, a state labor convention is a revelation. I marveled at the intelligence and learning of a great majority of the delegates, as well as the beauty of the women members and devotees present. Why, my dear reader, there were men in the recent convention of the Iowa State Federation of Labor who had spent three-fourths of their fifty and sixty years of life underneath the surface of the earth mining that which made the long winter evenings a source of comfort and edification for you and me. These same delegates could get up and address the convention, passionately or impassionately, according to the occasion, in language of such purity and elegance of diction as would chagrin many a self-conscious printer, newspaper man or university-educated lawyer. Of the grievous mistakes in pronunciation made on the floor of the convention, I observed that they were uniformly made by printers and newspaper men—men who had educations thrust upon them and should know better. My life has been made richer by a knowledge and acquaintance of these humble coal-miner delegates. I am not surprised that their cause prospers, that they increase in numbers and replenish the earth with noble examples of brotherhood and sacrifice.

VINCENNES, IND.

There are times when a few lines from the home of "Alice of Old Vincennes" would be a great help to the fraternity, especially when we can demonstrate that it is easy to secure the eight-hour day. There was, of course, some trouble expected, but we emerged from the fray with the best end of the deal. There was a great amount of personality indulged in by the bosses, all done to belittle the members of No. 395 and First Vice-President Hays, who was sent here to reach an agreement. We finally won out, but not as well as was expected, and, by the granting of eight hours on January 1, surely there need be no kicking. The new scale and eight hours granted is entirely satisfactory to the majority, and the minority will have to buckle themselves together and do the greatest good to the largest number. Only four offices agreed to sign the scale—the Labor News, Commercial, Capital and Sun. The three shops that are non-union are the Democrat, Cratt's job office and the Hitt Printing and Rubber Stamp Company, the former a regular kindergarten and cheap-wage concern.

Charles Somes, a veteran printer, stopped off here for a few days on his way to the Home at Colorado Springs. "Dock," as he is better known, has been at the business over fifty years, and goes to the Home for his health.

Sorry to say that No. 395 will not send a delegate to the Toronto convention, but our well wishes for the continuance of the administration of James M. Lynch et al. are here made known. President Lynch and Secretary Bramwood are certainly all there, and it is due to their untiring efforts that the International Typographical Union is what it is today—the best international organization extant.

As No. 395 has secured the eight-hour day, being the fourth in the state to get on the band wagon, let us hear from the rest. Fall in line, and don't wait until January 1, 1906. J. C. Mayes.

PETERBOROUGH, ONT.

The Review has recently installed a new Duplex press.

Two new typograph machines have lately come to this town. The Examiner has placed one of the "improved" makes in position, while the Review has installed another one of the old style. There are now ten machines in Peterborough.

Mr. Albert Martin will represent No. 248 at Toronto.

Peterborough Typographical Union No. 248 has submitted a new proposed scale of wages to the employing printers of Peterborough. The scale calls for foremen, $15; floormen, $12; typograph operators, $13. The old conditions and number of hours per week are to remain the same, the agreement to run to December 31, 1905.

Peterborough will become a city on July 1, 1905. It now has a population of about 15,000, and is generally acknowledged to be one of the most go-ahead towns in Canada. Walter Peters.

QUESTIONS ASKED BY A JUDGE.

Judge James Phelan, of Detroit, asks these questions:

"Have you ever known of a trades council or labor organization corrupting or debauching a legislature of any state?

"Have you ever read of a labor organization, no matter how humble, corrupting or debauching the members of a common council for the purpose of securing a franchise?

"And is it not the principal object of labor organizations to secure a better wage, such as will enable its members to leave their children in the schoolroom instead of sending them to the doorways of factories seeking employment at the tender age of fourteen?"—Teamsters' Magazine.

DENVER, COLO.

The newly-elected officers of the union were installed at the last meeting, and President Collett appointed his cabinet as follows: Executive committee, Messrs. Otis, Green, Ferris and Eckard; appeals, Hanson, McLean, Palmer; laws, Brill, Lambert, McClusky; reading clerk, Ashley. Practically a new deal all around, but all good fellows who will do their utmost for the success of the union.

P. C. Rector, one if our oldtime jobbers, realizes that if he is ever to get in the Rockefeller class he will have to embark in something outside of the rule case, and has entered into the furniture trade with O. L. Stiles.

The several branches of the pressmen's union entertained many of the delegates on the way to the San Francisco convention the early part of June. Automobile rides, liquid refreshments and the like were the bill, and all were well pleased. President Higgins and the executive board also passed through, but remained but a few hours. Frank Pampusch, well known to many printers throughout the country, was one of the delegates from here.

J. W. White, well known to all printers in many sections of the country, and a delegate to many conventions before the segregation, will represent Denver stereotypers at the Chicago convention. Dick Birkdahl will serve as delegate from Mailers' Union No. 8 at the Toronto convention.

John E. White, the single tax member of Chicago No. 16, was in the city lately on an agitating tour for his belief.

"Billy" Milburn, known to many old-timers of the country as delegate to several conventions, and foreman of a number of Denver papers, has entirely shaken the printing business, and is now doing the insurance stunt.

"Yank" (O. L.) Smith is seriously considering the renewing of his youth by attending the Toronto convention.

John Henderson, bank boy on the Post, recently took unto himself a bride, and the boys in the office presented the couple with a handsome set of dishes as a token of esteem.

Will Ketcham has been compelled to give up his position on the Mining Record and return to the Home, owing to the precarious condition of his health.

I learn that Charley Carter, erstwhile delegate and organizer from New York No. 6, who has been domiciled at the Home for some time, is to step into a nice outdoor position under the Colorado Springs administration of the city government. His many friends rejoice at his good fortune.

Jim Coughlin's family has returned to Chicago, the altitude being too high for Mrs. Coughlin. Jim is doing well, is healthy and gaining, and is breaking into the agitating game here. He will remain for the present, at least.

Harry Parker, late of Sioux City, St. Paul and other more or less centers of population, coined a new one the other day. The "back-cap" had touched on some printers not leaving one point until they had a situation to go to. Parker said, "Oh, they are mail order printers." By the way, Harry has been laid up with a bad wrist He is subbing on the News.

George T. McNamara and wife started for Washington state overland the early part of the month. Word from him at Cheyenne states his trip is proving agreeable to himself and the missus, but that he had lost his coat and vest and traveling card. He got a new card.

John Oliver has gone to the northwest for a tour of a few weeks. He was at Portland when heard from, and expects to return.

C. W. Sohmes, for thirty-five years a card member, was in town a few days lately on his way to the Home, from Memphis. He is sixty-eight years old, and it is interesting to hear his tales of the early days.

San Francisco employing printers have been running ads in patents of the various ready print houses of the country calling for men at that city, assuring them of plenty of work and good pay. To many it portends trouble. The officers of No. 49, not to be behind, also inserted ads in the papers issued from the house here, advising printers to stay away from 'Frisco. It will be very few in this section that will be lured to grab at the "tea-pot's" bait. Most all are now in the unions of the state. If trouble comes anywhere we will all be in at the start and the finish. There should be no let-up on the getting into the ranks of all printers in all sections.

A ropeless special from Chicago's ex-delegates' committee informs me that that organization is preparing to entertain in great shape all delegates and visitors who pass through the unsalted city on the way to Toronto. It is said that the big doin's will break out on Thursday, August 10, early in the morning and continue until late the next noon.

C. R. Breidenstein, of the News, who is well known to the craft in Cleveland and Asheville, and represented the latter organization at Cincinnati, is truly having his share of misfortune. Recently he buried his wife, and the middle of the month was called to Iowa by the death of his father.

Quite a number of changes since last report. M. Curtis Jones has gone to Portland. Jimmy McConnell left for Seattle, but his destination is more apt to be Chicago. Henry Anger sold out his interest in the Great Western Printing Company and left for Oshkosh, Wis., where he expects to enter upon a life partnership. R. G. Linebarger came from Trinidad with his card, married a charming Rocky Ford young lady and left for Wallace, Idaho, to work on Dave Coates's paper. Webb Purdy quit the Springs and bought into the Great Western. G. P. Christie came in from Albany, worked a day or so, but found the call of the tame was too strong, and he went back. M. C. Webster, who came from Scotland and joined the union here and held a sit at Smith-Brooks for a long time, left for a steady in Honolulu. Wadsworth came back from Goldfield and slipped into the assistant foremanship at the Western Union.

Frank Messenger, who has been very ill, is around again and at work on the Post. He is making the gamest fight for life imaginable.

Harry Holdsworth, formerly of Chicago, here at one time, and later touring the coast, is now at Douglas, Ariz. He was recently married to Miss Daisy Macdonald, of this city, at that place, a sister of Mrs. H. E. Garman.

"Spud" Wilson, long a proofreader on the Post, has at last broke out of the treadmill, and has purchased a paper at Aztec, N. M. His friends wish him the best.

The proposed purchase of lots for a union hall by No. 49 is progressing. Chairman Neighbor reported at the last meeting that several sites were under favorable consideration, and it is more than likely that the deal will be put through.

Superintendent Deacon was up the other day arranging for the big barbecue at the Home on July 4, and there will be quite a number of visitors from here attend. Incidentally he gave it out that the Springs was going hotfoot after the 1906 convention, that the citizens of that burg would foot all the expenses, and that none of the state unions would be asked to contribute. No. 82 is very much in earnest, and it is said that it will have plenty of money to foot all bills. They are also going to try and have a law passed to have the convention meet every ten years in the Home city, as it will be ten years in 1906 since the convention met at the Home.

Frank Willard, formerly of Galveston, Chicago, LaCrosse and many other great seaports, for some years assistant foreman on the Post, is just as spry as ever, and age don't seem to creep upon him a bit. He has some great tales of the long ago and the old boys who made the early trails to unionism easy for us of the later day.

Following cards have been deposited since last report: L. H. Davidson, Pueblo; R. G. Linebarger, Trinidad; W. V. Shumway, Trinidad; Oscar Milhollan, Oklahoma City; G. P. Christie, Albany; W. L. Allen, St. Louis; Ed Blanchard, Fort Worth; William Dunn, Rochester; John W. Dauthrich, Coffeyville, Kan.; B. F. Bowen, Cripple Creek; F. S. Porter, Ogden; H. F. Young, Galveston; Robert McNabb, Dallas; Victor Larson, Colorado Springs; J. B. Wagoner, Salt Lake; William Hardwich, Colorado Springs; J. W. Hennen, Los Angeles; E. E. Garrison, Milwaukee; J. W. Warful, Des Moines; C. F. Faith, Pueblo; W. E. Purdy, Colorado Springs; W. E. Phelps, Salt Lake City; C. C. Shuster, Salt Lake City; C. F. Bense, Salt Lake City; Miss C. P. HARVEY E. GARMAN.

IF THE production of dollars is, or is to be, the chief aim of our people, then it might probably be well to lengthen the hours of toil, and history will therefore the sooner be able to record as a cause of our failure as a nation, that we lived out of harmony with right ideals.—Railway Conductor.

NOTES FROM THE PRINTERS' HOME.

A terrific visitation of rain and hail struck this section on the afternoon of May 22, breaking nearly every pane of glass in the Home greenhouses and stripping many of our shade trees of buds and leaves, just as some of them were nearly ready to blossom. Hailstones, many resembling diminutive icicles ("Spot" says he saw some as big as goose-eggs—which is probably an eggs-aggeration), covered our balconies to the depth of three inches when the storm was over, and under one window there was a bank of hailstones four feet wide and three feet thick. Our basement, including the dining room and billiard room, was flooded with water, which accompanied the hail in the nature of a cloudburst. The storm destroyed many plants and flowers, and the house-tents were for a time rendered uninhabitable. Next day the plains as far as visible were covered with a white carpet of hail with the compactness of ice-blocks, and the rush of water in the city lowlands undermined dwellings and carried away several outhouses. The damage to the Home grounds and buildings was estimated at $300, and that to the city amounted to several thousands.

Harry L. Cresswell ("printer lawyer"), of Grand Rapids Union No. 39; William H. Dunn, of Rochester No. 15; Luther Quick (a longtime resident), Harry McManus, Charles O. Hull, Henry Rogers, of New York No. 6, and John T. Gill, of Philadelphia No. 2, all recently vacated. Messrs. Cresswell, Quick, McManus, Rogers, Hull, and Gill returned to their respective home cities, but Brother Dunn deposited his card with No. 49 to work as a "jobber" in Denver.

Capt. H. P. Macloon, one of our resident veterans of the civil war, attended the recent G. A. R. encampment in Denver, enjoying the reunion hugely.

Leslie Adams and J. W. Coughlin, ex-residents, now of Denver, gave us a recent Sunday visit.

On Memorial day, which was appropriately observed in Colorado Springs by ceremonies, parades and speeches, many of our residents visited Evergreen Cemetery and the graves of more than 100 who died at the Home; but there was no general decoration in memory of our departed craftsmen.

At the June meeting of No. 82, W. A. Snyder, delegate-elect to the Toronto convention, was instructed to use his best efforts to secure the next meeting of the International Union at Colorado Springs. The following gentlemen were appointed as a committee to work for the convention in 1906: Charles Deacon, chairman; W. A. Snyder, Thomas McCaffery, John J. McCarty and A. J. E. Hubbard.

Arrangements are being made to have a grand celebration and barbecue at the Home on the Fourth, participated in by union printers and their families. Ball games, races and other sports will be on the program. The members of the state allied printing crafts will be invited to the festivities. This celebration will take the place of our annual picnic.

Bound volumes of Harper's and Peterson's magazines, Tennyson's Poems, Thackeray (ten books), Waverley and other novels, "The War Between the States" (by Alexander H. Stephens) and "The Lost Cause" (by Pollard), etc., were recently donated to our library by authors and private individuals. The collection makes a total of sixty-eight volumes.

The writer is under obligations to Charles A. Gallagher for memoranda in making up Home notes.

Sam Woodman, of No. 49; George W. Newland, of No. 174; Thomas F. Duke, of No. 80; Raymond Sommer, of No. 103, and Lee Kelly Nieswanger, of No. 21, are among recent arrivals for residence at the Home.

Professor Argo, in charge of teachers and students of the Colorado State Deaf and Blind Institute, entertained the denizens of the Home on the evening of May 26 with a vocal and instrumental concert, which was thoroughly enjoyed by a large audience. The drill and tableaux of the students were also attractive features of the program. In behalf of the residents, Superintendent Deacon returned thanks in a neat little speech.

John Z. White, an old and talented member of Chicago Typographical Union, favored our residents with an eloquent lecture on the single tax June 2. Mr. White, who had previously been lecturing in eastern cities on economic subjects, was making a lecture tour through Colorado at the time of his visit, and spoke to crowded houses in Denver and Colorado Springs on "The Open Shop," "Municipal Ownership," "The Single Tax," and other industrial and economic questions. He is a fluent and convincing public speaker, and illustrates his points with amusing anecdotes.

A complimentary invitation to attend the Elks' fiesta at Temple Theater was extended to our residents the closing day, and was thoroughly enjoyed by the visitors. The Elks' minstrels, who performed at the fiesta, repeated their entertainment on the Home stage May 29. The musical numbers rendered on this occasion completely eclipsed all previous stage performances at our institution. At least that is the writer's humble opinion. Thanks, B. P. O. E.

A. O. Taylor, the Home engineer, was the winner of a handsome buggy, raffled off at the Elks' fiesta.

Samuel Boll, a resident from No. 6, recently received the sad tidings from Brooklyn, N. Y., of the death of his aged father. Mr. Boll has the heartfelt sympathy of our residents in the bereavement.

The Home baseball team is again equipped for the season, and several games have already been played upon our diamond.

A magnificent chart has been drawn by Gardener Westland, which exhibits plans of the landscape gardening for the season. He and his assistants are hard at work carrying out the designs.

Charles W. Hill, from No. 190, April 6, vacated May 20, and returned to Omaha. Mr. Hill is troubled with an affection of the eyes, which increased during his short sojourn at the Home; hence his sudden vacation. Luther Quick vacated for the same reason.

About two hundred delegates to the annual convention of the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union of North America, recently held in San Francisco, visited our institution in a body June 15. The visitors spent several days in this region, and were royally entertained by the Colorado Springs pressmen.

The deaths of Charles G. Reid and Adrian M. Jones, both former residents of the Home, caused profound sorrow to all who knew them.

It is reported that Charles Payne Smith has assumed editorial control of the Cripple Creek Forum, a new democratic daily.

Clarence C. French, admitted from Quincy Union No. 59 about thirteen months ago, vacated June 10 and returned to his home city, much improved in health.

The Elks and commission men played a game of baseball on the Home diamond June 9, resulting in a victory for the latter by a score of 14 to 2.

James F. Gallagher, an old-timer from New York No. 6, joined our gray-haired typo veterans June 9. His card numbers 35 in a membership of 6,000.

Bound volumes of the Critic, the Forum and the North American Review, the gifts of William Lycett, of "Big Six," were recently added to the Home library.

J. J. McCarthy, a well-known typo from Augusta, Ga., who has been sojourning in Denver for his health, was one of our recent visitors. Mr. McCarthy was on his way to Dalhart, Texas, where he expects to publish a newspaper.

Edward Sheffield, from St. Louis No. 8, who has resided at the Home since 1892, has been granted a government pension of $8 per month for services in the Indian wars. Captain Sheffield volunteered in defense of the white settlers in Oregon in 1855, and subsequently enlisted in Uncle Sam's forces as captain. He is now seventy-six years old, and is both an artist and a poet of considerable ability.

Colorado Springs, Colo. O. LANGFORD.

WASHINGTON, PA.

The election here on the 17th of May was certainly a spirited affair, the entire membership except six going to the polls. The election was held in Frank ("Pony") Judson's print shop, who very courteously threw the shop open (not the open shop) to the "boys."

During the month of May the following "large" labor leaders were visitors to our "little" city: Hon. T. V. Powderly, of Washington, D. C., calling on friends; H. Miller, of the International Brewery Workers, coming from Cincinnati; and William E. Terry, of Washington, D. C., general organizer for the American Federation of Labor.

Our city sends a representative of the job branch to Toronto. Good enough. These are the people we all want to help. Our elected delegate to Toronto, Robert C. McCracken, is for Pittsburg in 1906.

Work is good here.

George W. Brice, better known by the craft and his many friends here as "Watty," died Thursday, June 8, at an institution near Pittsburg, where he was taken a few weeks ago.

One more application in for membership to No. 456 swells the number of members to thirty-three.

PITTSBURG, PA.

Matters are evidently shaped now for giving the American Federation of Labor delegates and other visitors a welcome that will be appreciated, we think. Pittsburg is quite able to handle any large gathering or convention, and more especially one representing the laboring people. This is one of the world's great centers of labor and unions of all kinds and crafts find place.

At the June meeting of No. 7 it was voted unanimously to have the name of C. A. Rook, president of the Dispatch Publishing Company, placed on the honorary list.

The Pittsburg and Allegheny city directory is about ready for subscribers. The work was distributed among different plants, but first of all union men were considered.

Opinions differ this year as to the most fitting way for the several unions hereabouts to observe Labor day, Monday, September 4. For the past two or three years a parade was held, which was made up of union men of all crafts. It looks now as though a monster picnic and field day will serve as the best and most appropriate form of celebration.

G. E. Hoskinson, former secretary-treasurer of No. 7, has been endorsed for the postmastership of Crafton, one of Pittsburg's largest suburbs. Aside from the boost his fellow craftsmen gave him, several other labor organizations hope for his success in gaining the appointment.

Ere this goes to press "Billy" Calvert will be sailing across the "briny deep" to his native sod. "Billy" and his father, Robert Calvert, will make a stay of several weeks in England and Ireland before their return to the famous town of McKees Rocks, which is now located on the banks of the Chartiers and Ohio rivers.

Our new president, Chambers M. Leighley, was called upon to make a speech immediately on the assumption of his duties. He responded briefly and in a way which left no mistake as to the kind of government we may expect for the next year. Seventeen years ago he was the choice of No. 7, and now the same conservative method that he always followed will govern him in his rulings. He spoke of the possible vital matters being brought up for consideration, and that he tried to get the men for the several committees who would work always for the best and do most for our old No. 7.

Those who are to represent their union at Toronto will confer an everlasting favor on No. 7 and Pittsburg by casting their ballot to bring the gathering here in 1906. Hunt up Delegates Klein and Kennedy soon as you get to Toronto.

Good reports have been coming from Fred Horne down in San Antonio, Texas. He is said to be very much improved in health, which will be pleasing news to his host of friends hereabouts.

Believing it best to compose our eight-hour committee mostly from the job branch, President Leighley appointed four job men and one news man on the work now going on, it seems, very satisfactorily in our city.

Since my letter of June it has been the misfortune of our household to part with our little girl, Ethel Naomi, just coming to the age when she was most appreciated. Mrs. Campbell and the writer certainly appreciate the warm sympathy extended to us, not only by relations and other friends, but by so many members of No. 7.

A very pleasant place indeed is now the hall on the first Sunday of each month. No. 7 has business sessions now that are not only a great means of instruction in unionism, but we gather every four weeks to greet our fellow member as "brother." The spirit of fraternalism has much to do with the upbuilding of any organization.

James Curtin made a call on Pittsburg a few days ago. "Jim" is looking about ten years younger than when he started for "Little" Washington. He says it agrees with him in more ways than one.

Trade is only fair here now. Part of June and all of July and August are periods a large number of our offices call dull.

At the June business meeting No. 7 decided to appropriately recognize the long service of retiring President George Bradley. Accordingly, his successor chose Messrs. Driver, Culley and James Adams to make the choice. They have well done their work. Brother George thinks that he never saw a fob and charm that suited him better. On the face of the locket charm in raised letters are T. U. No. 7, and on the reverse side the fact is made known that George Bradley was appreciated as president of the union in Pittsburg.

The Dispatch bowling team certainly had a royal good time in Baltimore and Washington, in fact, so good that they won but a single game, and that one in Baltimore. Not even a "look in" on the games was credited them in the Capital City.

Secretary-Treasurer Charles Q. Lafferty is spending this week with relatives in West Union, Ohio.

William Hunter, more familiarly known as "Dick," lies very ill at his residence in this city.

HARRY C. CAMPBELL.

OMAHA, NEB.

Congratulations to J. J. Dirks on his election as delegate.

President Fisher and Thomas Sturgess represented No. 190 at the Chicago eight-hour conference.

The eight-hour day is as sure to come as that men must work.

"The only objection I have to THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL," said a member of the editorial staff, "is that it is so filled with good things that I have not time to read all."

Samuel Gompers was in Omaha the last Sunday in May and addressed a good-sized audience of local wage workers. His encouraging words to the printers were received with enthusiastic applause.

Rev. Newman Hall Burdick, of the Second Presbyterian Church, made application for active membership in No. 190 and was unanimously elected. Rev. Burdick desires to judge the actions of the union from the inside rather than from the outside, and No. 190 was willing and anxious to aid him in the matter. Mr. Burdick is an ex-printer, and was an ardent supporter of the movement which ended in an exchange of fraternal delegates between the local central labor union and the local ministerial association.

"All students of industrial problems should hear both sides of the controversy. Mr. T. W. McCullough will speak on 'The Doctrine of Collective Bargaining' at Creighton hall, Fifteenth and Harney streets, Wednesday evening, June 28, under the auspices of Typographical Union No. 190. Everybody invited. Admission free." Those are the words of a dodger that is being circulated about Omaha and which explains itself.

As was stated last month in this column, a monotype night school was opened in Omaha with "the playing of bands and blowing of trumpets" by two local members of the typothetæ, who control the only monotype keyboards (three) in Omaha. The object of the school was primarily to make job printers to take the place of printers who will insist on the eight-hour day soon, but the real object was to start trouble in advance. No. 190 paid no attention to the opening of the school and thereby disappointed the seekers for trouble. The school has turned out to be just what it was expected to be—a farce.

There has been organized in Omaha a union label league and a printer was elected its president. The organization has been in existence about two months and already has done good work. It is the intention of the league to make it easy for unionists to buy goods with the union label by securing the name of the firm handling label goods, the brand and the price, thereby obviating any possible chance for the unfriendly merchant to raise the price. A bulletin will be issued, giving the brand and price of the various articles bearing the label and the name of the dealer. By this means it will not be necessary to call for label goods, because you will know beforehand who handles the article you desire and its price. The slogan of the league is "Make it Easy to Buy Union Label Goods."

I. J. Copenharve.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.

WANTED—Non-union typesetters to leave the city; will pay $19.50 per week, nine hours per day. Address, giving full particulars as to experience and where last employed, O-18, this office.

Above is a fair sample of the "feelers" that often appear in the local press. If this one does express a "real" demand, its wording proves how ignorant the author is of ordinary working conditions. Non-union printers are not inclined to stray far from home nowadays, because a union card is an essential part of one's equipment while on the road. But perhaps O-18's request for non-union printers was due to the fact that union men are not at present seeking nine-hour positions, but are booming the eight-hour day. After that is realized perhaps they might move a bit!

On Sunday evening, May 28, a benefit concert was given in Cook Opera House for Frank L. Wyman, of the Times chapel, who has been in poor health and unable to work. The concert was undertaken by employes of the Times, local theatrical people kindly furnishing the entertainment. It was a decided success in every way, and a substantial sum realized for a worthy cause. The committee in charge desires to express its appreciation of the hearty support given it by members and friends of No. 15.

The annual outing of the allied printing trades council was held on June 2, the regular meeting being postponed for one week to enable all to attend. The program contained, among other things, a sketch of each affiliated union, with portraits of officers.

Rochester secures another large corporation. But this one comes on trial! Cluett, Peabody & Co., shirts, collars and cuffs, Troy, N. Y., has leased the abandoned trust tobacco factory for ten years, with option of buying at the end of that time should local conditions be to its liking. The firm employs about 3,000 "hands," so the papers say, and like the Stromberg-Carlson concern, comes to this city upon the assumption that "free" (cheap) labor may be had galore. A benevolent organization known as the chamber of commerce, which has charge of the city's advertising, is responsible for this claim, and it seems to be having considerable success of late in convincing long-headed capitalists that Rochester really has advantages over other labor-troubled places. The mayor of the city has also assured the Cluett company that he will not permit any labor "disturbance" to interfere with the benevolent process of transferring the lives of women and children into collars and cuffs. He knows whereof he speaks, too, for the interests behind him seem to have the local government "cinched"; for the working people still vote as "citizens" or "taxpayers." Our captains of industry are short-sighted indeed if they believe the restraint of organized labor can be avoided by moving from one place to another. United effort by the working people to secure better conditions and reclaim their rights is not limited by time or place. Born of necessity, it will express itself whenever and wherever the oppression of capital and the intelligence of the workers awakens within them the spirit of revolt.

Rochester, with her numerous pleasure resorts and nearness to Toronto, affords an excellent chance for delegates en route to spend the Sunday before the first session of the convention as guests of No. 15. Delegates traveling by way of this city who feel disposed to accept our invitation to stop over are assured a hearty welcome and jolly good time by the ex-delegates' association, which has the entertainment in charge.

One of the features of "delegate day" will be the publication of a forty-eight-page souvenir history of No. 15, to be distributed among our guests and members. It will contain a sketch of the organization, a list of members, officers and ex-delegates, as well as half-tone portraits of incumbent officers and delegates-elect. A section will be set aside for local advertisers who desire to show their appreciation of organized labor. Robert N. Chapman has been "hustling" for the souvenir, which is expected to be a valued memento of the eight-hour campaign.

report back some detailed plan of conducting a more effective campaign for the label. One proposition which meets with a great deal of favor is for the council to print every month or two an accurate list of unfair concerns, as well as all that handle label goods. The chief aim is to provide a substitute for the unfair house, without which the boycott becomes a farce. Affiliated unions are expected to mail these lists to all members on their books, and bear the expense of postage. In this way the concerted action of the entire trade union movement of the city would be directed into practical channels, the expense equitably distributed and every individual unionist kept informed upon the subject. A campaign along new lines will soon be started by the council if only the different unions show a desire to co-operate.

Trade unions are considered "good" by the employers so long as their efforts are confined to disciplining members, collecting dues and paying death benefits. As soon as higher wages and shorter hours become part of the program they are immediately pronounced "agencies of oppression."

No. 15 sends one jobman and one newsman to the International convention—but both are "one" for the eight-hour day. HENRY D. HENDERSON.

ALBANY, N. Y.

Tuesday, June 6, John J. Tiernan died very suddenly. Apoplexy was the assigned cause. John J. Tiernan has long been an active and well-known member of No. 4. He was treasurer of the union in 1880-1881, during Thomas Palmatier's first term as president, and was prominent in union affairs during the succeeding years up to 1889, when he was elected president and served one year, and represented his union two years later at the convention held in Boston in 1891. Since that time he has been less prominently identified with the active work of the union. For the last two or three years he was chairman of the J. B. Lyon No. 1 bookroom chapel, where he has for many years been employed. The chapel attended the funeral Friday afternoon in a body. He was fifty-five years old. Mr. Tiernan is the first death among our ex-presidents for some years, the last one being Dennis W. Feehan, some nine or ten years ago. In fact this is the first death of any member who has been president of No. 4 since 1875, which was the year Mr. Feehan was in the chair, and we have two living, and still members, who were president before that date, viz.: Francis Freckelton and John McKenna. There is also one other ex-president yet living in this city (but who is not now a member) who antedates the last two mentioned—Thomas H. Willard—who was president in 1865. The complete list of surviving ex-presidents of No. 4, besides those already mentioned is as follows: David Handless, Andrew J. Murphy, Walter S. Van Wie, Thomas Palmatier, Peter W. Fuller, William G. Johnston, Patrick J. Doyle, Thomas F. Murtaugh, James J. Wall, William Walls, James A. Kirwin, Edward A. Keyes, John J. Howe, Michael J. Sullivan, Philip T. Daly, Frank Henzel, James H. Markey and Wellington B. Clark, priority of service in the order named. Mr. Van Wie is located in the west, Mr. Fuller in Newburgh, N. Y., and Mr. Keyes in Troy. The others are yet members of No. 4.

Louis Fambach, a member of "Big 6" and employed on the New York World, was in this city during the past month attending a wedding. While here he called upon some of his old New York friends, among others being Foreman Kelsey and R. K. Youngblood, of the Hamilton street branch of the J. B. Lyon Company. His trip will include Niagara Falls and Thousand Islands.

The election of local officers on May 17 called out a much larger vote than was anticipated, there being 346 votes cast out of a possible 428. The fact that there were four aspirants for delegatorial honors explains the interest. The two defeated candidates, Richard J. Foster and Francis E. Rich, received sixty-eight and forty-five votes, respectively. There was no opposition to any other part of the ticket.

Two more applications for membership were received at the June meeting from Slingerlands. That will make twelve members No. 4 will have in this suburb of Albany.

The state printing bids for the ensuing year were opened June 6. The Brandow Printing Company was again the lowest bidder.

George P. Christie returned safely from his month's vacation trip, having made the rounds via Chicago to Denver and Colorado Springs, Kansas City, Washington and New York, home again.

In order to bring about a more fraternal feeling among the members of the craft about forty-five of the members of No. 86 "essembled" and organized a social club called the "Ben Franklin Association." Rooms were rented and furnished, and from nothing but "hot air" was evolved a very creditable organization. The rooms are nicely furnished and afford a very pleasant place for the members to spend an evening or a Sunday. On the last birthday anniversary of the esteemed Ben the association gave a banquet commemorating the event. Although there was an embryo blizzard raging and with two feet of snow on the ground, all the members turned out and a very enjoyable time was had. Of course an event of this kind is now ancient history, but one feature of the occasion is worthy of special mention. Our worthy president, Andrew J. Mengel, acted as toastmaster, and at an opportune moment a handsome oil painting of Ben Franklin was presented to the club. The portrait was painted by a member of the craft, and is worthy of a place in any art collection. It is 28x40 and represents old Ben sitting in a chair, a manuscript in his hand. His benignant countenance is not bent on the manuscript, but is gazing out over vacant space, as though his mind were looking into the dim and distant future. It is a very lifelike portrait and is a credit to the member of the craft who painted it.

On June 1 the employes in the news room of the Reading Eagle were granted an increase of 25 cents per day. This is over and above the scale, and was merely an act of generosity on the part of the superintendent of the paper, John W. Rauch, than whom there does not exist a more generous and whole-souled superintendent. While he is "business" to the backbone, yet he is always one of the first to grant any reasonable demand, whether of No. 86 or of the individual. This raise means something to the men, coming, as it did, not on demand, but simply at the request of the men. Mr. Rauch, while not a member of the union, is a union man to the backbone, and has often been quoted as saying that he wanted his establishment to be "union from cellar to roof." Would that there were more like him.

At a meeting of the business committee of the union it was decided to issue a trade paper, to be the official organ of No. 86. It is to be tried as an experiment for three months, and if found to come within a reasonable amount of being self-sustaining, will be continued ad infinitum. It will contain an original article or two, an editorial (?) or two, and other chapel news and information of interest to the craft. There will be no fat jobs on the paper at present, but if it should prove a success there may be a situation or two given out.

No. 86 is nothing if not progressive. We have a label committee, and the committee has been authorized to get out a card in two colors, said cards to be posted in the advertising department of the street railways of the city. How is that for boosting the label?

January 1, 1906—the day is slowly approaching. While it will not affect No. 86, as we have had the eight-hour day now for over a year, yet it behooves members of the craft all over the country to gird up their loins and be prepared to "swat the enemy." For they—the enemy—have already donned their coat of mail and are prepared to make the fight of their lives.

The federated trades council decided to hold its second carnival at the fair grounds on next Labor day. The event last year was such a brilliant success that it was determined to repeat it.

On the last Sunday in August No. 86 will hold an outing to commemorate the twentieth anniversary of its organization. From all indications it will be a gala event. Of course, there will be plenty of spring water on hand for assuaging that awful thirst which overtakes a man during the latter days of August. There will also be plenty to eat.

Work is fairly good at present, nearly every printer in town being employed.

The strike against three unfair offices—job offices—in the jurisdiction of No. 86 is still on. It is a hard matter to get at them, but the business committee is about to adopt an aggressive policy and use all honorable methods to whip the offenders into line. Let us hope they are successful. It is not a question of cost with the outstanding firms, as neither one of the three employs more than two men, but merely obstinacy and pigheadedness or mulishness. Merely a case of chronic dyspepsia on the part of the head of one firm, and a case of being "English, you know," on the part of the other firm.

UNION PRINTERS' HOME.

Where giant mountains lift their crests,
And valleys golden secrets hold,
And perfect air makes men live long,
There stands a home for printers old.

For knights of keyboard, stick and rule,
Whose union faith has stood the test,
If "slow" beneath the weight of years
Or by the needs of illness pressed.

It sent our banners to the van.
It said our brotherhood was true.
The crowning glory of the craft,
It honors Childs and Drexel, too,
Whose names shall live in union hearts
While printers ply the art of arts.

The action of No. 8 at the meeting of June 18, accepting the mandate of the executive council and revoking the repudiated nine-hour contract, thus raising the charter suspension and placing this splendid local in good standing and restoring it to its place on the eight-hour firing line, will be hailed with pleasure by the whole jurisdiction. As one of the minority who opposed the nine-hour contract, I say to the members of No. 8, "forget the unfortunate past and stand united for the future." To the membership in other cities my message is this: "Forgive the error and witness No. 8's redoubled efforts for the triumph of the eight-hour campaign."

Frank C. Fenn, a member of No. 8, employed on the Globe-Democrat as linotype operator, was drowned on Thursday, June 1, in Chouteau slough, an affluent of the Mississippi river, by the accidental capsizing of a rowboat. Two other Globe-Democrat operators, who completed the fishing party of three, had hairbreadth escapes. These were Frank M. Calvo and Nicholas M. Burke, the latter being quite ill for some days subsequent. The body of Mr. Fenn was sent to New Orleans, under escort of Mr. Croevdus, of No. 8, where the interment was made. A floral tribute from the Globe-Democrat chapel was ordered at New Orleans. Frank Fenn was a competent workman, a sterling union man, and enjoyed the respect and friendship of all who knew him. The regret at his untimely end is universal. Dick Holland, a former Globe operator, represented the chapel at the funeral.

The report on the Zeigler (Ill.) mine horror should put a quietus on the insidious insinuation that the explosion was caused by striking miners. The impossibility of this has been known all the while to persons in the vicinity, from the fact that around the time of the explosion, before and after, persons suspected of sympathy with the union cause were not allowed to enter the town to receive their mail. Now the consuls of the governments representing the men killed take the question up and—there is something doing. The philosophy of government seems these days to be—protect citizens when they are on foreign soil, but not at home.

I have a pronounced attack of mal de mer all night."

William J. Collins, a printer, who, in 1882, in a typesetting match won the championship from J. M. Johnson, who claimed to be the fastest typesetter in the country, died May 25 of paralysis at Clifton Hill, Mo., aged fifty-three years. Mr. Collins, before the linotypes came in use, was employed and well known in many of the city printing offices. The contest in which he achieved notoriety occurred in the Cincinnati Commercial office and lasted five hours.

We will hold our annual picnic some time in July, and judging from the reports of the picnic committee, it will be, as usual, one of the social events of the season.

Union will be called upon to test their strength and faithfulness to the parent body. The eight-hour movement is very little spoken of in Montreal, and members should take more interest in affairs that directly concern them and the future generations succeeding them. Let us remember the Israelites of old, whose leaders raised up a mighty cry against injustice and for reduction of working hours, and who finally won the greatest strike the world ever read of, through direct co-operation with their leaders. We can do the same if we put all petty jealousies and quarrels aside and put our shoulders to the wheel and give a mighty push. H. FRIEDLANDER.

NASHVILLE, TENN.

The Nashville Trades and Labor Council and the chamber of commerce have appointed committees to act jointly in an effort to work harmoniously on matters pertaining to the upbuilding of the city and in the interest of labor. This is a good move, and, if conducted conservatively and judiciously, should tend to minimize the opposition of the commercial body to labor matters in which the trades and labor council has been so persistently active. Such a step as this can at least be of no harm, even if there be no good results from it.

The boat excursion to have been given on June 15 by the woman's auxiliary to No. 20 was postponed on account of the extreme inclemency of the weather. No one should mistake the purpose of these entertainments. The ladies not only want to sell the tickets, but, what is more important, they desire every one who can to be present and lend assistance in bringing the printers' families and their friends together to enjoy the benefits derived from social acquaintance and intercourse.

Those who have been presented with the neat and attractive eight-hour buttons should wear them. One who enjoys now, or would like to enjoy, the eight-hour day ought not to be ashamed to let the world know it by wearing the button, nor should a man who earns his daily bread through the efforts of his fellows allow vanity to beguile him into feeling that he is too good to associate with them only while at work. Those thus afflicted with lack of gray matter are candidates for the inevitable dull, sickening thud.

Employing printers from the south held a meeting in Nashville on June 16 and 17. The sessions were held behind closed doors. While nothing could be learned as to the purpose of the conference, the following list of those in attendance indicates that the eight-hour demand of the International Typographical Union was certainly not overlooked: Foster & Webb, Marshall & Bruce, and C. H. Brandon, of the Brandon Printing Company, Nashville; L. T. Davidson, Louisville; W. H. Bates, Memphis; H. B. Drew, Jacksonville, Fla.; R. M. Ewing, Birmingham; W. H. Coggswell, Charleston, S. C.; L. Graham, New Orleans, and W. O. Foote, Atlanta.

The typographical unions in Tennessee should get together and take substantial steps toward the success of the eight-hour day. A conference of representatives from each union in the state would help some. The time between now and January 1 will pass rapidly. Nashville Union, which is unfortunately tied up for more than three years, will no doubt co-operate with other unions in the interest of the eight-hour movement. As Nashville is in the center of the state, it would not cost much for the other unions to send conferees here. However, this is merely a suggestion in line with like movements in other sections which have proved so very profitable. What is needed is a plan to work on which will get the country printer into the fold and out of danger of being gobbled up by the other side. Cost something? Yes. But can we or do we really expect to get something for nothing? Hardly. The opposition will spend money to win; we must spend both money and energy and must win, or else be prepared to accept humiliation as our portion. It is the duty of the local unions in Tennessee to spend their money in organizing the state at this supreme moment. Will they do it?

Since the organization of this union, two years ago, it has been steadily improving in point of membership and attendance. All of the offices have signed the scale, and the prospects for the eight-hour day are of a roseate hue. All but one employer has agreed to abide by the act of our membership.

On account of the recent disastrous fire here, causing a loss to the city of nearly three million dollars, and a loss to the printers of situations and homes, this local will not be represented at the Toronto convention. There is quite a number of tourists here now—more than usually at this season of the year. As a matter of fact, the local is composed of about one-half of the traveling gentry, hence the rather frequent changes in the offices of the union. In the last four months we have had four secretaries, but it is believed that the present incumbent, W. H. Watson, will continue until next election of International officers, as he is a "homesteader." Then, too, he may run to succeed himself.

BALTIMORE, MD.

A phrase as old as our national government, and perhaps much older, is "United we stand, divided we fall." Another of similar import is the motto of the United States government, the usual rendering of which is "One composed of many." The story is told of the noted Indian leader Pontiac (or was it Tecumseh), that, when persuading the warriors of neighboring tribes to join his braves and make common cause against the whites, he produced a twig, which he broke, saying that any boy could easily do the same. Then he showed them a half-dozen similar twigs bound together and defied any man in the assemblage to break them.

The idea of the strength of unity is well grounded, and is as plainly true to the savage as to his enlightened brother. All know its truth; all admit it; it is so evident that none may deny it. The use of the principle in its highest state is seen in the well-organized army, and, again, in weaker form, in the great political parties, and yet again in the churches and secret societies. All have a work to perform, and the individuals know that united action will come nearest to producing the desired result.

The trade unions are notable examples of the tremendous power of united action. Especially is this the case with the printers. Every member feels that his material well-being is bound up in the successful conduct of the International Typographical Union. I say the veriest dolt in the membership knows this, and yet he and the great preponderance—nay, almost the total personnel—of our organization consider that if the local union is properly supported enough has been done. This is all wrong. The principle of unity of action should be developed and fostered in every chapel; the men should get together; the real fraternal spirit should exist. It is safe to say that where such conditions prevail the men will come very near to meeting every obligation, whether it be to employer or fellow worker.

With this worthy object in view the chapel of the Baltimore American has an organization known as the American Club, which every six months gives a banquet for the furtherance of the social life of the print, where for a brief season we might forget the momentous routine of the modern morning newspaper and give ourselves over exclusively to that which accomplishes most for us in this workaday life of ours.

The American Club recently held its semi-annual banquet at the Hotel Lexington in this city, and besides the members of the club there were present some of the editorial staff and employes of the stereotyping department. The utmost good fellowship prevailed and the social feature was engendered by the commingling of the members of the various departments, and during the speech-making, which followed the serving of the courses, the speakers dwelt mainly upon the great amount of good which would be derived individually and collectively by our meeting in this manner to have social intercourse with one another. It makes us forget self; it causes us to put more energy into our daily labor; it dispels the idea that some of us have of our fellow worker, that he is better than we, and even in our homes are the beneficial influences of such gatherings felt.

It would not be amiss right here to say that were there more organizations of this character, where the members of our craft could be brought together to know one another better, where we might discuss matters other than those pertaining to "shop," as we are bound to do if we meet on the street or in the lunchroom or other places where printers are wont to congregate, there would be less backcapping and more of that feeling of brotherly love which, aside from the duty we owe our employer, is, or should be, our main object in the life we lead.

In conclusion would say the American Club does not confine itself to banquets every six months, but from time to time it has smokers for the membership, and it is hoped in the near future to have a place of meeting, so that we might meet whenever opportunity presents itself.

No. 509 is in fine condition.

We have just gotten all of our contracts signed up, reading from April 1, 1905, to January 1, 1907, giving us the eight-hour workday on January 1, 1906. This includes four newspaper offices and one job office. We have one office that would not sign a contract. It is a "holiness" paper, and they claim it is against their religion to sign a contract. They agree to work union men, and pay the scale, and are working two journeymen now. All of the proprietors are perfectly satisfied with their new contracts, and there is the best of feeling between them and the printers. The fact is our union is in better condition now than it has ever been before.

On Saturday night, June 3, we installed our new officers and had one of the best meetings the union ever held. After the business was over, the president appointed J. A. Hodge to "table" a freezer of cream that was in waiting for us, which he did in the style of a New York "flunkie," and to say we did justice to the cream would hardly be the word.

Our membership roll is now up to twenty, and if we continue to increase as we have in the last month we will be no small "pumpkins" some of these days.

One of our employers received a letter a few days ago asking him to join the typothetæ. He handed it to one of our journeymen and said: "You can answer that; I do not need it; the 'I. T. U.' is good enough for me."

We hope to have our delegate at Toronto, but are not certain yet whether he will be there or not.

We have found that it is not such hard work to get the eight-hour day, if it is worked in the proper way. Do not ask for less hours and also a raise in the scale of prices; that is too much, in our opinion.

Business is very good here; all journeymen are at work.

Work patiently for the eight-hour day, and we hope and trust all will get it. A. A. CLARK.

No. 175 has been busy during the past month endeavoring to straighten out a few internal "kinks." From present appearances the effort will be successful.

No. 175 has recently added three good men to the International Typographical Union roll, with prospects of several more before January 1, '06.

J. F. Michaels, ex-delegate '04, now a prosperous ranchman, has, it is said, successfully experimented with "sticky fly paper" in catching grasshoppers that were destroying his "garden truck." A rather funny thing is the fact that when a sufficient number of "hoppers" have attached themselves to a sheet of the paper they fly away with it—out to the prairie or to some other ranch—saving "Mike" the trouble of gathering them up.

Neil J. Crowley, delegate, and John G. Connor, alternate, were elected without opposition.

One day last week the proprietor of a country daily called up the foreman of a Pueblo paper, who has the reputation of being a "josher."

I will give the telephonic conversation:

Proprietor—Can you send me a good man to act as foreman on my daily?

Pueblo Foreman—Is it a day "sit"?

Prop.—No; morning paper; six days a week.

P. F.—What is the salary?

Prop.—I will pay $14 a week for an extra good man.

P. F.—Do you pay all cash, or part in orders?

Prop.—Oh, no; all cash; twice a month.

P. F.—Can he select his own boarding and lodging place?

Prop.—Well, I have a very nice room I can rent him—my other foreman roomed with me—but, of course, I'll leave this matter to him. I forgot to say that he must be a good ad man—up-to-date—as he will have to set the ads.

P. F.—Well, I will try and get you a man.

Prop. (two days later)—Did you get me a man?

P. F.—No, I haven't. I spoke to several good men, but they declined to go. They thought it was a get-rich-quick scheme and concluded—

Bang! went the 'phone. J. D. GAVITT.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.

The smoke of battle of the last election has now thoroughly cleared away, and those candidates who failed of election have shown that they are good losers, and have decided that since the membership preferred others for officers they would take their place in the ranks of No. 55 as privates and assist in the work of the organization on the firing line. A short sketch of the new officers may not be out of place at this time, and is herewith given, as follows:

James Taylor, president, is a native of London, Ontario, and after finishing his apprenticeship there came to this country and made a general tour of the east and west, finally locating in Syracuse in 1891 and remaining here up to date. He has held situations on the old Courier, News and Post-Standard, and is as good an all-round newspaper man as can be found. Mr. Taylor represented No. 55 in the central trades and labor assembly of Syracuse for many years, and was considered one of the brightest members of that body and one of its foremost workers. He is now a linotype operator on the Post-Standard. His acquaintance among the craft is large throughout this country and Canada, and his genial disposition has made him universally popular. He is an authority on local and international union law, and will capably fill the office of president of the premier union of the Salt City.

Our vice-president is George Shepperd, of the Herald chapel, whose work in the ad department is favorably known locally. George is a native of Syracuse, and has always worked on the Herald, where he is deservedly popular on account of his unfailing good humor and for being in possession constantly of "the smile that never comes off." He is a great entertainer, and is the life of many of the social affairs among the younger members of society. Should the occasion arise for him to preside in the absence of the president, he can be counted upon to give a good account of himself.

George Fitch, our secretary-treasurer, is now serving his second term, having been re-elected this year without opposition. He has been a member of No. 55 for fourteen years, and has always been a member of the Herald chapel, where he now manipulates the keyboard of a linotype, and manipulates it well at that. He formerly ran one of the old McMillan typesetting machines on the Herald before they were displaced by the Mergenthalers. George is the soul of geniality, and his popularity is unbounded. He is a prominent member of the Syracuse Whist Club and is an expert in this fine game. His conduct of the affairs of the office he fills has always been satisfactory, and he has shown that he is the right man for the place.

The position of recording secretary is filled by Arvine M. Knickerbocker, who occupies the position of proofreader on the Evening Journal. Mr. Knickerbocker has been engaged in newspaper work for many years, and was the mainstay of the old Sunday Times in its palmy days. Since his connection with No. 55 he has shown himself a consistent and energetic member, and has filled one term as recording secretary in a manner satisfactory to the organization. Like Mr. Fitch, he is an expert on whist, and his contributions on the game to the local papers are of an interesting and instructive character.

John Y. Clanton very capably fills the office of reading clerk, and is a worthy successor to his two predecessors, Howard Reynolds and W. P. Aberton. These boys set a swift pace to follow, but Mr. Clanton proves equal to the occasion. He is a job printer, and is a master of the craft.

Daniel Moynihan guards the door as sergeant-at-arms and keeps a sharp eye on things generally during the meetings. He has had the misfortune to become crippled with rheumatism for the last few years, and is not able to work at the business. Dan is one of the oldest members of No. 55, and has never wavered in his loyalty to the union.

James Scanlon, of the ad department of the Herald, will represent No. 55 at the International Typographical Union convention at Toronto. Jim is a native of Syracuse, and is a good representative of a good city. He learned his trade in the old Sunday Times office, and has been a member of the Herald chapel for a number of years. He filled the office of vice-president of No. 55 last term, and "made good" in every sense of the words. His numerous friends think he will bear watching, as he has all the elements in his makeup to become prominent in the labor movement.

Fred Scott is an "over homer," and learned to manipulate the "little leaden messengers" on the Toronto News. After serving his time he went to Buffalo, then to Boston and New York, where he worked on the principal newspapers and made friends with all with whom he came in contact by his unfailing unionism, his bubbling humor and his pungent wit. He has been in Syracuse for nine straight years now, and knows every member of No. 55 personally. He is greatly interested in labor affairs, and also in sporting matters, and is an authority on baseball, pugilism and athletics in general. Unionism runs in the Scott blood, as will be seen from the fact that Michael Scott, Fred's eldest brother, was a delegate from Toronto Union to the International Typographical Union convention in New York city in 1878, and John Scott, another brother, represented the same union at the International Typographical Union convention at Pittsburg, Pa. in 1886. Mr. Scott is one of our delegates to Toronto.

Aime Hamel, who learned his trade on the Post-Standard, was initiated at the last meeting, and has the reputation of being one boy who never gave a journeyman a saucy answer. He is now in the ad-room of the Post-Standard.

Here today and away tomorrow! These birds of passage have flitted through here recently: Harry Richardson, Oscar Grove, Matt Hayes, Fred Keiner, J. Pat Griffin, "Frenchy" Labelle, Basil Hanlon, George Bradley, "Reddy" Grant, T. C. Lovendale, William McGrath, Hugh Guthrie, "Kid" Ellis and "Paddy" Fowler.

Henry Vandervelde, the pride of Paterson, better known as "Sully," is on the Telegram in the ad department, and finds himself in congenial company.

Jacob Barth, of the Herald, who was stricken with pneumonia while in attendance as a delegate to the Foresters' convention at Saratoga, N. Y., six weeks ago, and who had a hard struggle for life, is now at his home here, and is gradually regaining his former health.

The oft-repeated statement that a candidate for International Typographical Union delegate must be a "good fellow" is disproved by the fact that Delegates Scanlon and Scott are both on the water wagon, though they are far from being puritanical.

Syracuse friends regret to hear of the deaths of "Parson" Downs and C. M. Galbraith.

News has been received from New York city that Charles ("Chippy") Neighbors, of Parsons, Kan., well known here, where he located for the last few years, is very ill in a hospital in the metropolis, and hopes are entertained that he will pull through all right.

F. A. WARD.

The eighth annual convention of the allied printing trades council of New York state will be held at Ithaca, beginning July 11, and will probably be in session three days. Headquarters will be at the Clinton House, which is a $2 per day and up house, and the business sessions will be held in the Trades Assembly hall. President Ed Nevins, of Ithaca Typographical Union, who, by the way, is an old No. 6 man, will chaperone the delegates, and any one who has met "Pop" knows that they will be well looked after. "Pop" is the proprietor of a sulphur spring on a plot of ground he owns near Ithaca, and it is said the waters of this spring are excellent for medicinal purposes, and particularly for that "morning after" feeling. Only on rare occasions are his friends permitted to enjoy the water from the spring, but this time there will be no limit.

A most distressing misfortune has overtaken Sam Gress, foreman of the Ithaca Democrat. Several weeks ago, while working around a press, he cut his hand slightly. Blood poisoning developed, and a few days ago his right forearm was amputated.

It has been suggested that a conference of representatives of the various typographical unions of the state be held on the eight-hour question, and it is likely that the suggestion will take tangible form soon. Several months ago in these columns I suggested that there be a general representation of the unions at the annual convention of the state printing trades council, at which this question could have been taken up, and several unions would have been saved the expense of sending representatives to both meetings. It must be apparent to every one that the signs all point to a tremendous struggle between the International Typographical Union and the typothetæ, and no time should be lost and nothing left undone to prepare for the struggle.

It is generally conceded that the country printer is an important factor to be reckoned with, but how best to reach and interest him is a perplexing problem. A limited experience has convinced me that it is more difficult than appears at first sight. The average country printer receives $8 or $9 or $10 per week. Over that amount is the exception. Many of them are married and are raising children. They are not contented with their lot, and invariably jump at a chance to take a position in the city. The only reason they stay where they are is because many of them have not the means to go to the city and wait for a permanent position. Their conception of the ethics of trade unions is not highly developed, but it is rarely they are opposed to them. On the contrary, their sympathies generally are with the union men. But the proposition to become an active member is decided not on sentiment or sympathy or ethics, but by the stern realities of their condition. The membership fee of $2 and the dues of 40 cents a month plus the one-half of 1 per cent special assessment seems trifling to many of us, but to our less fortunate neighbors it is frequently the deciding factor.

In a neighboring village a short time ago I met a young man who held a card and worked in Syracuse several years ago, but after going to this town he allowed his membership to lapse. He is married now and has three or four children, and earns less than $10 per week. Anxious though he is to lift himself out of the rut he finds himself in, his loyalty to his obligation is unquestioned. But there are a half score other printers in that town that have not had the spirit of unionism inculcated in them who told me, in effect, that they could not afford to pay the dues out of their meager earnings, and one can imagine what a terrible temptation it will be to them if they are asked to go into the city at an increase of wages of only $3 per week.

We know that it is morally wrong for a man to take the place of another who is striking to better his condition or uphold a principle. We feel that there is no justification for a man to say that he is willing to take a lower standard of citizenship than another, hence is willing to work for less money or longer hours. But will the man whose finer sensibilities have been blunted by intolerable conditions look at these things from our viewpoint?

The neighboring city of Auburn is to have a new, up-to-date daily paper, to be modeled, mechanically, so 'tis said, after the Binghamton Press. Any one who knows the excellence of the Binghamton Press plant and the condition of the Auburn daily papers can understand what a step this means. Don't swarm to Auburn, however, in the expectation of getting a sit, for the initial appearance of the paper is said to be several weeks away and there will doubtless be sufficient home talent to fill the positions.

The employes of the Telegram recently tendered a complimentary dinner to Charles E. Handy upon the occasion of his third anniversary as owner of the paper, and in the course of the evening presented him with a silver loving cup.

The edict compelling correspondents to sign their names was timely. No more thrusts in the dark.

THOMAS H. WHEATON.

THE common judgment of mankind has substantially agreed that eight hours is enough for labor, and the eight-hour day has been set as the standard for all trades to reach, has been adopted by governments, approved by thinkers and accepted by most enlightened capitalists.—San Francisco Examiner.

CLARKSBURG, W. VA.

Work is good here, with some overtime.

One new member at our last meeting.

The state federation of labor, which was in session here May 22-23, decided to move the headquarters from Huntington, W. Va., to Clarksburg, W. Va. After transacting other business which came up before them, they elected officers for the ensuing year, with George N. Kollman, of this city, as secretary-treasurer.

Our secretary-treasurer, C. M. Ward, was elected delegate to the Toronto convention.

It is with deep regret that we learn of the death of E. W. Patton, which occurred at Washington, D. C., on May 4, 1905. Mr. Patton was well known here, having learned his trade in this city. He was noted for his acts of kindness and charity.

THE JOURNAL last month was a peach. It is like wine, it improves with age. Success to THE JOURNAL.

J. G. Shaw, late of the Wheeling News staff, has purchased the Daily News.

Don't forget the union label. Ask for it—think of it—demand it—and you'll get it.

CONVENTION OF NEW ENGLAND ALLIED PRINTING TRADES.

The annual convention of the New England Allied Printing Trades was held at Fall River, June 13 and 14. It was largely attended, and there were many ex-delegates and visitors present, and the convention was noted for its enthusiasm on the eight-hour movement. The convention was addressed by Mayor Coughlin, who is a member of the street railway men's union. Organizer Scott addressed the convention on the eight-hour movement. An address was given by Joseph J. Jackson and one by Frank K. Foster, asking that all locals affiliate with the state federation of labor. The reports of President Dooley and the vice-presidents were to the point, and were closely listened to, as was Vice-President McGirr's supplementary report on the autoplate stereotype machine, which was an interesting paper. Park Mitchell's report was also very good. The secretary-treasurer's report showed a balance of $371. Resolutions were adopted justifying the contention of the International Typographical Union for the eight-hour day, and calling for a conference between the United Typothetæ and the International Typographical Union; urging the use of the label by the Royal Arcanum; endorsing the political program of the American Federation of Labor; recorded approval of the New England Civic Federation; urging members to push the label among fraternal societies, and disapproval of the movement being made to entangle the trade union movement in political affiliation. Miss Badger, of the local woman's label league, spoke of the work that was being done by the women in pushing the label. Norman McPhail addressed the convention on the subject of using the label on school books. Ex-Secretary-Treasurer J. F. Duggan and James Punch responded to invitations to speak. The following officers were elected: President, John Moffitt, Fall River pressmen; first vice-president, James F. McGirr, Boston stereotypers; second vice-president, Thomas M. Nolan, Boston typographical; third vice-president, Charles T. Scheuler, Lawrence pressmen; fourth vice-president, Arthur Ingersoll, Portland typographical; fifth vice-president, E. O. Beacham, Providence typographical; secretary-treasurer, P. H. McMahon, North Adams typographical. The next convention will be held at Springfield. A resolution was passed just before the convention adjourned condemning the St. Louis Union for signing an agreement for three years on a nine-hour basis, and the resolutions were sent to St. Louis. The International Typographical Union executive council was commended for its prompt action in the matter. The delegates were royally entertained by the members of the Fall River unions.

P. H. McMahon, Secretary-Treasurer.

"GUESS AT IT, FRED."

A story comes from the composing room of one of Troy's Sunday papers that a certain operator, not so very long ago, got a take which consisted of a program for a church Sunday service. Among the numbers there was one, a solo, which he could not decipher. In an endeavor to save time he called the attention of the proofreader to the matter in about the same space as the recalcitrant solo would occupy. In fact, he asked the proofreader, whose name, by the way, is Fred, to guess at it. But Fred's guessing faculty that night was not working right, and he failed to notice anything wrong. As for the operator, he forgot about it, and the next morning there appeared in the paper a very interesting program number. It read thus: "Mr. Thomas Impett will sing 'Guess at It, Fred.'" The only one who did not see the ludicrous part of the incident was the colonel, who thought there were enough riddles in his paper without inserting some more in church programs. J. E. Rivet.

PHOENIX, ARIZ.

At the regular meeting of No. 352 on the first Sunday in June the following officers were elected for the ensuing term: President, J. A. Ball; vice-president, George E. McKay; secretary-treasurer, S. Palmer; recording secretary, Ben Steffen; sergent-at-arms, Roy Loman.

The following machine scale was also adopted: Night work—Machinist-operator, $5; operators, $4.50. Day work—Machinist-operator, $4.50; operators, $4. All offices here have been paying this scale for some time, hence its adoption by the union.

A fine of $2.50 for the first offense, and $5 for every offense thereafter, is now imposed on any member of this union for buying non-union tobacco of any kind.

The Phœnix Printing Company installed a jumbo machine in its job office about the first of May. Ben Steffen is in charge of same.

A. J. Lane, who spent a year in the Home at Colorado Springs, coming from there to this place, and who was for one term president of No. 352, left some time ago for his home in Toronto, where he hopes to welcome the Arizona delegation to the convention.

L. T. Whitson, who also came here some two months ago from the Home at Colorado Springs, left on the 2d of June for his home in Newport News, Va., in hopes that the change would improve his health.

S. Palmer, who has most ably filled the office of secretary-treasurer at this place for several terms, resigned on the 9th of June and left for Prescott, Ariz., to take a sit on the Herald machine. Fred Volz was appointed to fill the unexpired term.

Ed Hays, an operator who is well known throughout the south, arrived a short time ago, and after a couple of weeks' work left for the coast.

George Ward, ex-president of Prescott Union, is now learning to manipulate a machine on the Republican.

William B. Goode, linotype inspector for this section, was here a short time ago.

The writer had the good fortune to be elected delegate to the convention, and hopes to be there to answer roll call. George Brown is alternate.

Phœnix will be there with eight hours on January 1, 1906! J. A. Ball.

NEW CASTLE, PA.

Trade conditions have held up pretty well.

The least of No. 270's troubles is the eight-hour question.

The first installment of this union toward the Cummings memorial fund was voted at the last meeting.

It is a source of gratification to see Greenville within the fold. Evidence of Organizer Dolan's doings. There are a few other places that need looking after in this section, but doubtless Mr. Dolan is after 'em.

If the maxim that in union there is strength be true, it seems evident that a great deal of butter used in New Castle must be union made.—News.

The election of a delegate is a matter of history, indeed, if it can be classed as an item of history at all in local union affairs. For reasons scarcely known it was the tamest ever known. Contrary to previous times the office went begging for candidates. The union is not by any means unanimous in its willingness to send a delegate, on account of financial resources. Fourteen votes were counted. Eugene Gleason, of the Herald, and Elmer Engle, of the News, for delegate and alternate, respectively, were the only candidates in the field, and, of course, were elected.

A committee has been appointed for the purpose of arranging for an afternoon's outing or picnic of the printers and their wives, sweethearts and friends, in the near future.

The printers' union, as well as several others that had withdrawn, has reunited with the trades and labor assembly, which has been practically reorganized.

The New Castle Herald (daily and weekly) has been purchased by Addison C. Dickson, of Newark, Ohio. Immediate possession was given, and it is said the new management proposes spending about $13,000 on equipment and improvements, with additions to its force. The News and the Herald have been close rivals, with the News having the advantage of being longer established and without contentions and changes in the management. It may well be surmised that the News is not by any means idle. One of the things in line by Manager Rentz is a sixteen-page, straight-line Goss perfecting press, and also additions to its force. At the present time the plant is doubtless equal to any between Pittsburg and Erie. ELMER S. MILLS.

"A KICK."

I wish to "register a kick" against the secretaries of some local unions in behalf of our traveling members, who, I think, are entitled to some consideration and a true statement as regards state of trade.

In looking over the June JOURNAL, in a letter I find the following item:

At present we have all that can be done in the way of work in the various job shops. All have been rushed, and help has been very scarce.

Now, I was in the town one week in May (from the 9th to the 15th), and during that time, though I showed up in the "various job shops" every morning, all the work I received was two hours' distribution the last day I was there. Besides, there were four printers (all home people) who had not had a day's work in several weeks, and three others who were working only half time, and five tourists came through while I was there, and they got no work.

When I saw that item I wrote a friend of mine in the town, asking him if work was picking up any, and mentioning that item. I received reply that it was all "bosh," and that work was worse than ever.

Tourist printers, seeing an item like that, in the hope of picking up a little work, would go perhaps two hundred miles in order to get there, only to find out the truth—"nothing doing." I have been fooled that way myself more than once.

I think that secretaries ought to find out the facts first about work, or cut it out entirely.

WORK AFTER HIS OWN HEART.

China is passing through a very serious financial crisis. Prices have risen so that the poor are nearly starved. Wages have not risen, so the trade unions have been organizing strikes, and the employes who are non-union men have resorted to stealing and many similar methods to compel their employers to advance their wages. So all have suffered.

The above is from the report of a Baptist missionary in China, date, 1904, and causes us to tremble for the future of mankind. For verily, brethren, when the festive Chink gets to the stage where he organizes labor unions, then, indeed, have we butted into most strenuous times.

And just think, brethren, what an opportunity this affords for a Parry in China! Trade unions striking and non-union men stealing! Allee samee 'Melican manee. I move that a few cents be added to our per capita dues to provide a fund to be used in shipping Parry to the Heathen Chinee, where he is most needed. Surely, he could not refuse to hear the wail of anguish that has gone up from the downtrodden capitalists of China, some of whom may have made their pile peeling 'taters in his back yard, and have returned to lord it over their folks at home. Surely these have fallen upon evil ways, and Parry should hasten to the rescue of his friends. To spare him from home just now would be a grievous thing, of course, but in such a cause we should not hesitate. Non-unionists are stealing and men are striking in China, and obviously that's the place for Parry; so vote the money, and in the immortal words of John Kelly, "let 'er slide." Let it not be said that the International Typographical Union is deaf to the cry of distress. E. E. SOUTHARD.

Portland, Ore.

MONTREAL, CAN.

On the day set for that purpose took place the election of delegates of No. 145 to the annual convention of the International Typographical Union. There were four candidates running for the honor, and two were to be elected. The fortunate fellows are Messrs. Buno Vauthier and Victor Tardif, the former being elected by a large plurality. He will make a splendid delegate, talking English fluently, well posted generally, as square as a die, and a jolly good fellow. The latter, M. Tardif, is our former delegate, also a well-informed fellow. The defeated candidates will allow me to remark that to succeed in this, as in all other posts in the gift of No. 145, it is essential to be well acquainted with the English language, and to possess a little diplomacy—diplomacy played quite a part in the election of the delegates; but, as the French say, "Honneur à qui de droit,"—pay honor to whom honor is due.

No. 145 is preparing for the big battle which will undoubtedly take place on the first of January next and after—an eight-hours-per-day battle. The special war tax levied for that purpose is somewhat freely and regularly paid in, but the idea seems to prevail that nothing definite will result of the engagement, that feeling being caused partly by the result of our last strike and partly through indifference.

For some time past extraordinary proceedings have taken place at our meetings. Let us consider in cold blood what transpired when excitement and ignorance prevented sound judgment from prevailing. It can not possibly do us any harm. Some time ago a newspaper foreman discharged an operator, the order coming from the office, and giving him the usual eight days' notice. The operator brought the question before the regular meeting of No. 145, claiming he had been "fired" without cause, and added, through malice. The matter was handed over to the executive committee, who found the foreman guilty of malice, etc., and he was lectured for his act. The extraordinary part in the proceedings was this: The discharged operator was a member of the executive committee and signed the verdict, thereby becoming a judge in his own behalf. I doubt whether its parallel has ever happened in a civilized country. And for another:

The chairman of a certain chapel sent in a written accusation to the union against a member of his chapel, accusing said member of having used undue influence—political and religious—in getting his position, against the will of the foreman, and of causing a regular member of the chapel to be laid off in order to give the accused a job. The executive committee was given charge of the case. A trial took place, and at the last regular meeting of No. 145 the said committee brought in a verdict of guilty, and recommended that the constitution should follow its course—that is, a two-thirds vote of the members present be taken for the expulsion of the accused. At this point the rules of the International Typographical Union, under which the trial took place, were openly violated and some very radical speeches were made. To make a long story short, the vote was taken for expulsion and was lost, the executive committee voting against its own verdict and recommendation, and no further action was taken against the accused, who is still working in the said chapel, to the detriment of the regular member, who is now, through lack of work, a weather inspector. The job is not a bad one, but the salary attached to it is. Why did the committee vote against its own verdict and recommendation? Probably because it calculated the vote would be lost, therefore being obliged to resign, according to the well-known French custom. The chapel in question considers that it is useless to try and enforce the constitution; in fact, it argues that a permit was given them by the recent actions of the executive committee to do exactly the other way. I fully believe that these tremendous "fiascoes" are caused by our members not understanding properly the concise and to-the-point language of the International Typographical Union constitution. Most of our members read and understand English, but, as remarked above, the short and sweet wording of the International Typographical Union staggers them. The sooner No. 145 realizes the necessity of translating the International Typographical Union constitution into French the better our union will be. Violation of rules will then be a thing of the past, and our meetings will not be controlled by a mere few who barely understand the difficult reading of the International Typographical Union constitution—I mean difficult from the point of view of a foreigner.

Toronto boys are preparing for the great convention. The reception to be given the delegates will be unusual, the city officially taking part, which is no small honor when one considers that Toronto is the second city of the Dominion. If my information is right, there will be—between work and pleasure—very little time for rest. The delegates who will not be obliged to return to their homes immediately after the convention should take a trip down the river and visit Montreal and old Quebec. Montreal was once the home of many famous men who played important roles in American history, such as Cadillac de Lamothe, founder of Detroit, Pere Marquette, Jean-Baptiste de la Salle, etc., etc., and Ben Franklin, the printer, inventor, etc., America's first ambassador to the court of France. The St. Lawrence Hall would greatly interest the delegates, it being in that famous hotel that many of the important battles fought during the war of secession were planned. Quebec would cause the visitors to wonder and think. One can hardly turn a corner without being reminded that once upon a time Indian, French, English and, in a minor degree, American blood had flown in some fierce combat. There is no other city in the world like Quebec—it is "unique." It is not a progressive city—far from that, slow in every way; no murders, no divorce, no ladies' entrance surrounded by red lights, no vast private fortunes, no Carnegies, Hooleys, Meuniers, Rockefellers, such as we see in our modern cities—progress, I believe they call it. The trip itself is beautiful, and I trust many delegates will be able to take it in.

The annual outing of Jacques-Cartier Union No. 145 will this year be held at Burlington, Vt., and a success is anticipated. Our English "confrères" are also working on their annual field day. The Daily Star will have a big excursion of its own on Confederation day, July 1.

President Lynch is expected to make a call shortly in Montreal. He will be more than welcome.

ABILENE, TEXAS.

Last February the printers of this town organized, applied for a charter, and the first of March became a subordinate union, for all of which we are duly thankful, as we now receive the benefit of a weekly payday, nine hours instead of ten, as formerly, and an increase of wages for the majority.

No communications have been sent from No. 494 because we first wanted to know what tribulations would be our portion, but all things concerning printerdom in this section are at present very pleasant, and have been so from the beginning.

All offices accepted the scale and hours without friction, and all proprietors eligible have the current working card.

With the advent of the union, consequent shortening of number of hours and elimination of the regular one-night-in-a-week press time, there has been no increase of force. The boys have worked with more vim and pleasure, verifying the saying that the same amount of work can be performed in shorter hours, because each man has incentive, as a member of the union, to "make good."

The election of a delegate was passed up—none of the boys having acquaintance with the side-door Pullman.

It seems to us undeniable that if the country proprietors are drawn into the typothetæ they will be the whisk brooms of the city proprietors, by depriving themselves of competent journeymen, sweeping them cityward to accept more lucrative pay. In other words, the country print will have to hustle for pastures newer and greener; and it is a fact that competent printers will be as scarce as hens' teeth, because they will be in the thick of the fight. Another thing, the average country printer is not going to jeopardize his future.

OTTAWA, CANADA.

The typos are smiling in Ottawa just now. The inaugural of the eight-hour day is a success. All the job offices have conceded the request. It is a big gain and an innovation that should be appreciated by the honest employe. The newspaper offices had the eight-hour regime previously, so had the Bureau. It means about 10 per cent of an increase. A small additional amount, which the user of printers' ink will have to pay for.

The eight-hour day, to my mind, should be made a success. It can only be so if the man with principle, the competent printer, will understand he is bound to do a fair day's work.

The Printer and Publisher says in its last issue: "S. E. Dawson, king's printer for the Dominion, knows how to write a good report. He has the knack of infusing interest into a dull and cumbersome subject. Thus it is that the report of his department, recently laid before parliament, is picked up and examined with decidedly more avidity than the majority of the other blue books of the session. Lack of room and adequate facilities is again Mr. Dawson's chief cause of complaint. Late arrival of copy is another of his difficulties. Notwithstanding, the story of the past year's work is one to be proud of. Cumbered as he was, the king's printer succeeded in turning out the work as it was required and in a most satisfactory manner. Mr. Dawson has made an excellent case for himself and his department." There is no doubt about this. Mr. Dawson's side is that of the practical business man, who knows every nook and corner of the business, and the other side is that of the politician, inexperienced theorist. It takes a practical man to understand Mr. Dawson's position; that's all. Besides being a practical man Mr. Dawson is a lover of literature and one of the best pens known here; that explains in a word why every one of his reports is so interesting, logical, reasonable and practical. The king's printer has his faults—who is perfect in this world—but few fair-minded men will credit him with ever having placed politics before duty and not having always endeavored to devote his entire energy in the promotion of the best interests confided to him.

No. 102 has had its delegatorial elections. There were candidates plentifully. For the International convention, Draper, Waters, St. Jacques, Ladmantaye and Leclair were in the field. The French erred in placing in the field so many candidates. Draper and Waters were elected. The former has a record of strenuous work for No. 102, whilst Waters, a newcomer for favors, has been a good officer and is hardly to be surpassed as a canvasser. Both men will make good delegates, and the French should begin to polish their armor for the next contest. There should never be a division of the votes. They are entitled to representation, but can not blame anybody if they are not displaying sufficient foresight to protect their own interests. After the election Draper expressed the view that it was not always the best policy to follow the idea that each man should have his turn, or that because a man had been delegated he should take a back seat. I concur in this view. Experience teaches the wisdom of it. A delegate must acquire experience before he can be of real use to the body that elects him, and No. 102 has had the same experience. Each time important missions were given to those who lacked this, tottering work was had, a feeling of uncertainty prevailed, and nothing was obtained. It is not every one that can be a valuable delegate. Every one can take an outing and enjoy himself, but the sincere delegate looks for more. He wants to be an active participant in the work of the convention, and to do so he must be posted, understand the routine and rules, and be possessed of a fair knowledge of convention work.

There was a big field for the labor congress delegateship. Sixteen candidates in all. Many of the men were entitled to honors and many were not. Labor is a question involving study, and the interests appertaining thereto require watchful consideration and continual care on the part of the one who desires to pay attention to such. Sometimes unions proclaim that such and such a body is manipulated by a clique. It may be so, but who is to blame? The conventions are, after all, but a body made out of the delegates sent by the inferior or subordinate bodies. If the delegates are poorly qualified, the best element within that convention will naturally rule. It is obvious, therefore, that a careful choice by the subordinate bodies is essential if cliques are to be wiped out, and if the combined intellectual force of representation is to obtain sway. The brainy but illogical group will assert itself the easier upon a weaker element than upon a well disciplined, educated and experienced contingent. That has been seen more times than I could mention. The judgment of one who dips into the constant study of labor affairs is keener, better, and the radical can expect to find in him a stouter opponent than he would in the first arrival and the inexperienced fellow who has neither the conception of his duties nor of the principles he is expected to be the sponsor of. That is the difference. Ald. Pepper, Robert Mackel and C. S. O. Boudreault were elected. When the field is known the election was certainly not one of small importance, and an election under the circumstances was no small event, indeed.

At the last meeting of No. 102 it was announced that two International organizers were getting their ammunition ready, one Brother James in Toronto, a western district, and the other a printer from the metropolis, who, we were told, was ready to come to Ottawa and bag, nolens-volens, all the unfair offices in the capital. I have been harping upon that string for some time. I am really glad at last the big guns are smiling upon us and that a source of considerable annoyance to the honest employer is about to be removed.

The discussions of late in No. 102 are lively and interesting. That augurs well.

It is said Montwing, of the printing bureau, has started another large printery in Hull. It includes a bindery, shingle machine, mill-wood agency, political agency, and it is likely a laundry will soon be added.

hours of any trade in the neighborhood, are making real and earnest progress. They are about to score on short hours.

The situation is generally brighter.

First-class linotype operators, understanding French and English, are a scarce article on the market.

The Taylor Printing House has invested in a monotype. Six job offices have secured machines now. Who says printing is not advancing in the capital?

A young machinist took my advice a few months ago, went to Philadelphia, learned to master the monotype caster, and has returned with experience, a fashionable Roosevelt as headgear, an elaborate watch chain, and is now investing $18 per week in his pocketbook. That is as good as going West.

C. S. O. BOUDREAULT.

"GOD'S OWN COUNTRY."

FROM AN AUSTRALIAN POINT OF VIEW.

He was an enthusiastic, hustling native of the Land of the Stars and Stripes, and his eyes beamed upon me and his face was animation itself as he addressed me thus: "Yes, sir, you're going to God's own country when you take ship to the United States. Why, it's the greatest country on earth; that's a fact. And when you land at San Francisco, after passing the Golden Gate, you'll fall down on your knees and thank God you're under the same flag as Teddy Roosevelt."

Since then I have met hundreds of Americans, foreign and native-born. From each I have got the same sentiment, although differently expressed. Perhaps it is not too much to advance this as a theory for quite a lot of the phenomenal success of this great and growing country—this innate and inculcated pride in her resources, her achievements, her power.

Reading the contribution in a recent issue from G. I. Brayton, who at the time of writing was in Sydney, New South Wales, it has occurred to me that readers of THE JOURNAL might be interested with a few impressions of America on the mind of an antipodean.

Let me at the outset disclaim any intention toward "boosting" or "knocking" either country. A traveler should have a mind perfectly free and receptive, and unhampered by prejudice, either patriotic or the reverse.

Mr. Brayton has given a very true picture of Australian conditions and life. I can imagine how astonished an American would be at the absence of the familiar ice-wagon, the electric fan, the soda fountain; how strangely crude it must have seemed to work in printshops where the only drinking water was the lukewarm fluid from the faucet.

But as all my life prior to this trip was passed in Melbourne, the capital of the sister state, Victoria, I am necessarily more conversant with affairs there. And in this city there are some half-dozen printshops which, for up-to-date methods and systematic procedure, will rank favorably with those over here, as well as numerous others "getting that way."

The office our friend did his stunt in was one of a type unfortunately common enough; but still it is not advisable to use such a shop as a basis for condemnation. In the Melbourne offices I have referred to there are slugs in abundance, all leads and slugs are even ems, the cases are laid exactly as in America, labor-saving material—rules, steel furniture, etc.—is plentiful, and in some (few enough) the point system has been adopted in its entirety. Of course, I understand Mr. Brayton distinctly particularizes New South Wales, but the tendency for any one reading the article is to include all Australia in the criticism. A very hazy idea of the country exists over here.

Our friend's strictures on linotype operators and offices I will pass without comment. They are, I believe, only too true. And this is a phase of the question he would be well qualified to judge.

It was with a view to arriving at a personal knowledge of conditions over here that Fred B. Howard and I started from "home" last May. Contradictory reports, magnified stories of long hours—more than counterbalancing the higher wages received—and blood-curdling tales of the terrible strain of the everlasting American hustle. These were some of the bogies we met with for some time prior to our departure. We landed in 'Frisco fully expecting to work sixty hours a week for $18!

I want to remark right now upon the best feature of American printshops—the foreman engaging the hands. We, knowing nothing of conditions in force, came armed with multitudes of recommendations and testimonials. Most of them lie in my trunk with a rubber band around them. The great advantage, as both my partner and I can testify (having worked under both regimes), is that merit is the sole arbiter. "If you suit, I'll hire you; if you don't, I'll fire you." And what more could a man ask? In Australia application in most instances is made to the office, and I know of several foremen who have men in their charge whom they deem incompetent but are powerless to dismiss.

A great difference is seen in the personalities of the unions. Financially, the antipodean societies are very strong, but they don't begin to compare with the unions over here in power. It was at a union shop there that the men were compelled to make out their weekly pay dockets in the lunch hour; and at the same place the foreman took a fad in his head to change the time of starting and quitting, which was done without any regard to the feelings of the men in the matter.

I speak from personal acquaintance with both man and shop when I say that a fellow came in with a big reputation and fell down on a job of about an hour and a half work, which, being rejected by the foreman, he was PRESENTED WITH A BILL FOR. In that place it is common for men to pay for spoiled work, no matter how excusable the error; and the reader used to amuse himself counting over his accounts. He was an exception, however, for HE NEVER PAID ANY.

But I think this was the limit: Men were supposed to so prepare two-color forms that when sent to press they would register—or, at least, not more than half an hour was to be spent on them. All time over that would be charged to the compositor. However, I will not weary you with accounts of men being engaged in the morning and laid off at noon; fellows being dispensed with, after about five days' work, at half-past three on the Friday; two-thirders equaling men in number, although the union regulations were one apprentice to every three journeymen. Understand, these conditions did not prevail all over Melbourne, but that they obtained in even one union office is sufficient.

At this time, I worked at a number of places, and in but one was I met by a chairman with a request to show my card. This place enjoys quite an enviable reputation on account of its strength.

But now Victoria, distinct from New South Wales with its arbitration act, has a wages board. I remember the howl of discontent when the same wage was agreed to—$12.50 for forty-eight hours—as had been in force for some years under union jurisdiction. This was reduced by agreement when the great depression succeeded the notorious land boom, on the distinct understanding. I believe, that when times again grew prosperous it was to resume its old status.

The wages board is composed of three members from employers and employes, with an independent chairman. The curious feature of the $12.50 decision was that had the union representatives "stuck out" for $13.50 the whole proposition would have fallen through.

Even at $12.50 the legislation must have caused many a flutter. I am stating absolute facts when I tell you that in a non-union shop, doing some of the best work in the city, before the decision became effectual, the highest-paid compositor was receiving $10, others $8.75, $7.50 and $5. One two-thirder, a young fellow about eighteen years old, was receiving $3.

In the pressroom of this place was a man in charge of two cylinders, who received the munificent wage of $5; platen press feeders were getting as much as $1.75, $2, $2.50 and $3.

I think the foreman of the composing room, who was practically a superintendent of the entire place, got about $15.

So you see it must have been a godsend to these people when parliament decreed that all printing offices in the metropolitan area were to come under the board's ruling.

As far as business management in Melbourne offices is concerned, they seem away behind. In the shops there are worry, squabbling and loss of time to an extent undreamt of here. What one might term "finicking," arising from indecision on the part of responsible heads, is indictable for most of these things.

Not once, but many times, have I observed a foreman "calling a man down" for some trifling offense which involved about fifteen minutes' time, and the gentleman has taken forty-five minutes to impress upon the delinquent the enormity of the offense.

The Victorian wages board has fixed the working week at forty-eight hours. You will remark "week." This has given many employers a loophole. For should a holiday occur in any week in which a man has worked, say seven hours overtime, he receives but ordinary pay for this last, as his total for the six days has not exceeded forty-eight hours. Some employers do not take advantage of this. I can particularize one office where the average working hours per week throughout the entire year can not be less than fifty-four on account of the regularity of the overtime. So you see that the Melbourne compositor—or part of him—works fifty-four hours, much of it night work, for about $15.25. Yet this is an eight-hour town, legislated by act of parliament.

A year's residence in America enables me to compare prices of commodities. The following are reasonable figures of the cost of living and the wages:

MELBOURNE.—Statutory Wage, $12.50 per week of Forty-eight Hours.

Board and room (within walking distance of the city, including laundry)	$4 00	to	$5 00
Tailor-made clothes (any others are unfit to wear)	15 00	to	20 00
Hats	1 50	to	3 50
Shoes	3 50	to	5 00

Shirts, underwear, hosiery, about same as here. Ties, about half-price, but not as good.

Rent (5-room house, bath, wash-troughs, wire-doors and blinds, garden back and front, handy to station and cars, three miles from downtown district), $3.

Fruit much cheaper, groceries variable, furniture of all sorts considerably higher, admission to good shows cheaper, car fares from 2 cents to 6 cents, gas about a dollar per foot, railroad fares in ten-miles radius, 2 cents a mile.

There are, of course, innumerable other things which play an important part, but these will suffice to show the cost of living for a man in a compositor's station of life.

I recall how careful I would be with a sixpence (12 cents) and would look askance at spending it on a drink, while a night at the grand opera with a companion, at a cost of about $2.50 all told, was a rare treat.

As I sit and write I wonder how men can possibly support wives and children on this wage; yet when I remark that there are thousands of unskilled laborers and artisans in other lines whose wages range from $7.50 to $10, you will understand why we printers were considered fortunate fellows.

It might interest you to read the following, clipped from a recent issue of the Melbourne Age. These are the minimum wages fixed by the various boards. In nearly every case the minimum becomes the maximum. A man, however good, has a lot of trouble in getting over the scale, and a dollar extra is supposed to be ample recompense for all time.

Agricultural laborers, $12.75 to $6; employed on dairy farms, adult males, $200 to $300 per year, with board to the value of 30 cents per day; ironmolders, $12; foundrymen, $12; brassworkers, $12; coppersmiths, $12 to $13; blacksmiths, $11 to $12; bricklayers, $15; stone carvers, $20; monumental carvers, $15.30; carpenters, $15; painters, $9 to $12; hatters, $12.50; tobacco workers, $10; shoemakers, $11.75; glass bottle makers, $11.50; tailors' cutters, $11.25; stock cutters, $12; male seam pressers, $8; pressers (machinists), $11.25; cabinet makers, $11.75; coach and carriage builders (general average), $11; dyers, $9.50; match makers (doesn't give particulars of those in the matrimonial line), $9.50; brush makers, $5.25 to $16; printers, $12.50 to $18.50; spinners, $9; weavers, $5.50 to $10; rope makers, $9; distillery employes, $10.75; breweries (general), $11; jewelers, males, $12.25 to $15, females, $7.50. With the exception of the two first-named, all these people work forty-eight hours per week. This is certainly one of the greatest boons in the place.

There are three things Australia is noted for: Being pioneers of the eight-hour day, originators of the most perfect ballot system in vogue, and the training ground of Robert Fitzsimmons. It is laughably common for us to be greeted with: "Oh, you're from Australia; that's where Bob Fitzsimmons comes from, isn't it?"

Melbourne, with a population of 500,000 people (one-third that of the state), has but one evening and two morning newspapers, although Australians are noted as the greatest newspaper readers per capita on earth.

When my friend and I left there a year ago we knew of but half a dozen soda fountains in the entire place. Ice is a rarity. In private houses of the better sort filters are used to cool the drinking water. Meals at restaurants vary from 8 cents to 24 cents straight; and most of the 12-cent houses—those are the most numerous—purvey an article inferior to the 15-cent restaurant in America.

White aprons are almost invariably used, even by pressmen. One large firm has made the anomaly even more glaring by equipping its men with white caps and overalls. The shop (at the beginning of the week) reminds one of a bakehouse. On the Saturday the resemblance is not so striking.

There is a lack of mechanical aids in many of the print shops. Heavy forms are carried down stairs at great risk and with much exertion. Platen and cylinder presses are under the one man's control, and are invariably together, sometimes a great distance from the composing room. The cylinders are mostly stop cylinders of English make. But there is a growing tendency in favor of American presses and type. Imposition is regulated by the folded sheet instead of the rule. The imposing stones are of iron, and very many houses still use the old-fashioned wooden quoins and sidesticks.

As to the style of job composition, it might be termed an intermediary between English and American. There are less of the "fol-de-rols" than is observable on most British work, yet the dignified simplicity and reliance on type and rule of the American vogue has not yet become common. I might say there is one office to which most of the foregoing remarks do not apply, and that is directed by Americans and equipped accordingly.

The streets of Melbourne are models of neatness and utility. Paved with rectangular blocks of jarrah lumber, they are coated over with asphalt, making perfect thoroughfares. A complete cable service of clean, good cars connects the whole city. It is slow, compared with the electric, but there are few accidents.

Australia knows not winter as an inland resident of the United States would understand it. The temperature seldom drops below 32 degrees above zero. One can ride a wheel throughout the year, if he can accommodate himself to the rain. Snow falls once in about twenty years. In the summer the heat sometimes becomes intense. This last was a very hot season, 109 degrees in the shade being recorded in Melbourne, and in the country as high as 125 degrees in the shade, when birds fell from the trees in a state of exhaustion and chickens died prior to an egg-laying competition. But such extremes are of rare occurrence. The principal sports are horseracing, cricket and football. On the day of the Melbourne Cup, one of the biggest races in the world, hundreds of thousands of dollars change hands, and the succeeding week generally marks several suicides. Physically, the average Australian is well developed. In general education I should say he was superior to the American. This is a moot point, but one less frequently meets with such distortions of English as appear so common over here. There is far more apparent drunkenness in Melbourne. Whether the quantity of intoxicants consumed is greater per head I can not say. One is very much impressed by the freedom from insulting remarks on walking down American streets; a practice far too common over there, chiefly indulged in by "pushes" of "larrikins," always cowards, generally bullies. I could continue at greater length, but fear to weary. The reason I prefer this country is because the standard of living is higher (though more costly), wages better, a far greater scope and freedom from restraint exists, and the place and the people are more progressive. It is nearer the great European centers of literature, music, art and drama, and offers more inducements to hustlers. Australia has some of the loveliest scenery on earth—waterfalls, fern gullies, mountainous crags, caves, and seascapes. Its climate is free from extreme cold, and its resources are even now comparatively unknown. In its productive soil can be raised all manner of grains and fruits, and where irrigation has been introduced the results have been wonderful. But it wants boosting, it requires world-wide advertising, it stands in need of an absorption of that intangible yet extremely real thing known as the American spirit. The spirit of discontent, the desire for change and improvement—call it what you will—is a most potent actuality and accounts very largely for her people's success.

Should any of the readers of THE JOURNAL care to write me I would be only too glad. I want to learn all I can about the United States and her people.

JOHN H. CLAYTON.

AN eight-hour workday which will afford the laborers a better opportunity for better homes will naturally enlarge the consuming power of that family. This gives to the market an impetus it can not conceive in any other way. No country has become a model for power or good morals based upon the impoverishment of its people, and this is also true of the employer.—Samuel Gompers.

HOUSTON, TEXAS.

Houston organized labor at last is to be quartered in a home worthy the name, and will celebrate the occasion in a befitting manner, on June 14, by a ball, banquet and housewarming. Speaking thus early in advance (June 9) all indications point to a most successful evening of enjoyment and recreation, as the various committees charged with responsibility for either the success or failure of the entertainment have been busily engaged in plans for the event for some weeks past. The building occupies a ground space of 53x112 feet, is new, of brick and four stories in height. The Labor Council holds it under a five-year lease. The ground floor will be rented out for commercial purposes. The second and third floors will be occupied for the assembly rooms and executive offices and committee rooms of the various locals, some forty in number, affiliated with the council. The fourth floor will be devoted to a ballroom and to lodge rooms for such secret orders as may desire to rent them from the council.

Work here, especially among handmen, has been only moderately good of late, the supply of help being slightly in excess of the demand. Recent departures, however, have somewhat equalized the situation in this respect. Usually work is good here at this season of the year, and it is hard to understand just what has produced the present laxity in the labor market.

The suggestion recently advanced by Jack Tracey, our Jacksonville correspondent, that a record of arrivals and departures and state of trade constitute a feature of each letter in THE JOURNAL, is indeed a good one, which will, I trust, be adopted hereafter by each correspondent. Ye printerman is somewhat prone to migrate with the changing of the seasons, for then does the germ of wanderlust in his blood assert its dominion, and no matter the strength of friendly ties left behind him at each place 'tis rarely, indeed, he puts himself to the trouble of preserving them through the medium of a personal correspondence, depending upon THE JOURNAL to keep him posted as to the doings and whereabouts of absent friends. We hope Tracey's suggestion will prevail, for verily, in the opinion of the average tourist (and there are many of him yet left, despite numerous recent laments anent "The Passing of the 'Bo"), therein lies the only possibility of improving THE JOURNAL. As an amendment to Mr. Tracey's motion, I would respectfully suggest that cognizance also be taken of the "birds of passage," i. e., those of the craft who only remain in town for a day or two before resuming their journey, and that the points of their departure and destination be given. To cinch the argument that the average printer is at best but a poor correspondent one has but to refer to the "Addresses Wanted" in each month's issue of our splendid little magazine.

John J. Whitley and Frank B. McCurdy will represent No. 87 at Toronto, and two more polished gentlemen and good printers would be hard to find. Both have long "borne the heat and toil of the day" in the cause of unionism, and their selection as delegates was a fitting tribute to the esteem in which they are held by their fellow craftsmen of the Bayou City. The series of illustrated cards issued by Mr. Whitley during his candidacy formed a unique feature of the campaign, which, incidentally, was one of the most spirited, cleanest and best natured ones ever conducted in Houston or elsewhere.

"Culchaw?" Why, my dear Bloomer, there is more genuine all-wool-and-a-yard-wide culture to the square inch in Texas than would be required to patch Faneuil Hall from basement to belfry! If one does not believe this assertion just let him ask Billy Wilkinson, head proofreader of the Austin Statesman.

Up in Austin a certain Teuton with an unpronounceable name conducts a thirst parlor well patronized by the craft, among whom he is referred to simply as "George Pieline." That name has the Indians bested.

A. Franklin Sittig, ex-president of this union, who came to Houston with a New Orleans card in 1874, recently conducted one of the most remarkable campaigns for the democratic mayoralty nomination ever witnessed in this city of strenuous municipal politics. He announced only four days previous to the primaries, and his campaign, though short, was of the whirlwind variety. Out of three thousand votes cast Mr. Sittig only lacked 125 of securing the nomination over the head of a former mayor of Houston, his opponent, one of the wealthiest and most astute politicians in this section.

dust of Texas from his feet and betaken himself to Charleston, W. Va. Since his departure from Houston, several years since, Mr. Quarles has been located in Fort Worth, where he served two terms as president of No. 198. The best wishes of many friends here and elsewhere in Texas go with him to his new field of endeavor. By the way, another one of Read's characters, William Moorhead, the original of the stuttering printer in "Emmet Bonlore," is casting up tables on state work for the State Printing Company at Austin, and is still as swift and accurate as he was in the days when he affiliated with the Missouri river pirates and made occasional side excursions to the printing centers of the effete east. With the exception of a few months in town each spring and summer in pursuit of his beloved occupation, Mr. Moorhead is spending the eventide of life upon a small stock ranch he owns within a few miles of the Pecos high bridge in Southwest Texas.

LET US ALL BE CONSISTENT.

It will soon be the apparent duty of every man who believes in trade unions to refuse to buy any product that has been produced under unfair conditions. It is now the duty of every union man to do this, but it does not seem to be apparent to a good many. The absolute refusal to buy "scab" goods would soon result in compelling organization of a vast number of workers who are now struggling long hours to maintain a miserable existence. A great many men and women do not know the immense benefits to be derived from a systematic, combined, organized effort of the working class to shorten hours and raise the standard of living. "Many can help one while one can not help many." We must learn to co-operate. The boycotting of a single firm or a long list of unfair firms is an ineffective method, as results in the past prove conclusively. If all the organized workers and their friends and sympathizers in St. Louis were to refuse to buy the "scab" product of a certain bakery, inside of a month one of two things would happen: Either the employes of the bakery would be organized or the bakery would go out of business. But if the same workers were to refuse to buy "scab" hats, clothes, shoes, cigars, beer, and the numberless other things they buy, the whole unfair list would be brought to terms in short order. Are you, who read this, consistent? Do you demand union-made goods and refuse any others when making purchases? It is your duty to do this. Make up your mind to do your duty, and try to get your neighbors and friends in line. Your example will do much in influencing others. Because some one else defaults will not excuse you. Some firms have recently asserted that they can do without the label. Will you allow them to make good such an assertion? It is up to the workers. It is our move. Let us act as a unit and prove that we are union men in fact as well as in name, and shorter hours and better times will come as a logical result. W. W. BAKER.

FORTY YEARS—AND IN IT YET.

At the Philadelphia convention of the "National" (June, 1865)—though the printers federate were then studying "What's in a name?"—I had the honor of a delegate seat. Happy memory recalls President Carver introducing William Sylvis, of the machinists, earnest advocate of trades fraternity, and other active leaders; but I was especially interested by the enthusiasm of Jonathan C. Fincher, editor of the Trades Review, which aimed to be an all-around labor paper, but just then was brilliantly alight with eight-hour sentiment; and my interest has never lowered. I look with great gladness at such record as shown on page 630 of your current issue, "What We Are Doing."

In editorial and correspondence THE JOURNAL exhorts: "Work for the eight-hour day!" There be many printers, however, who do not see how they can do more than make the demand and stand for it. Oh, if all were to do that the issue is sure; but experience shows that it takes longer to line up ALL than to fill a cemetery. Brother Whittemore, of Albany, urges that local unions reach out as wide as possible among country printers—nonmembers—with THE JOURNAL for the next six months; an excellent idea; there may be a dozen other schemes, but any or all of them may be tried on along with this. In fact, by just such means has the shorter workday gained the measure of strength it now has. In the fall of 1865, working in the village of Oneida, N. Y. (now a city, home of No. 336), where only four or five men were employed in the trade, I gathered a number—carpenters, teamsters, tin and iron workers—organizing an independent labor assembly, with platform: "Eight Hours, a Workday." We arranged with the newsdealer to place prominently on sale the Trades Review, taking up the left-overs ourselves and distributing so as to spread the light. Later we printed our "card" on envelopes—a stub across the left-hand end:

EIGHT HOURS OF RIGHT DOES AND BY LEGISLATIVE ACT SHOULD CONSTITUTE A DAY OF WORK.

The supreme court decision re the New York bakers does not come in against that; nor do I cite it as a form for use; but I do believe that there is need of getting labor literature into more general circulation than the average "labor organ" gives it—though we need every organ possible.

The envelopes, taken by hundreds and used at option, carried the shorter workday gospel into some circles where it seldom, if ever, got a moment of thought before.

These incidents are offered only as suggestive. We NEED to reach all who can be reached. Not only some employer who thinks the helpers ask too much; some superindustrious workman who thinks the lazy man wants an hour less of exercise, at present giving but enforced eye-service; not only the sophist who talks to please where he thinks to find readiest pay and largest purse—but the common people, the majority, are too much given to work, and it is hard to convince your neighbor, or any other man, that there is as much intemperance in work as in whiskey—it is so much more "respectable."

For the shorter workday, yours, as ever,

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

For the first time since 1868 Providence Typographical Union has elected two delegates to represent it in the International Union. In 1868 its representatives were E. A. Wilcox and R. S. Menamin, both now deceased. Mr. Menamin was at that time a resident of Philadelphia and publisher of the Printers' Circular, the official organ of the craft. He had also represented Providence in the conventions of 1865 and 1866.

The convention of 1867, held at Memphis, Tenn., enacted legislation providing for a "new constitution for the National Union," a "uniform constitution for all subordinate unions," and a "national fund law." The existing constitution provided that amendments should be offered at the previous annual session. Protests against the adoption of the proposed legislation, based on its illegality, were presented to the convention, but the vote was overwhelmingly in favor of the new legislation. The Printers' Circular denounced the new legislation and urged the craft to array itself in opposition to its enforcement. On the other hand, President Oberly, who had been instrumental in its adoption, proclaimed it to be the law. An active canvass was made during the year by both parties for delegates to the session of 1868, held at Washington. The result of the contest was the selection of a majority of delegates who supported Mr. Menamin's views, and the Memphis legislation was not recognized as legal at the sixteenth session, nor afterwards.

Providence had two representatives in the 1888 convention—William M. Leavitt, now of Washington, D. C., and James H. Russell, now on the Worcester Telegram. It elected but one. There was a contest, and the convention seated both.

The two delegates this year are elected as distinct representatives of the two branches of the trade—newspaper and book and job. Eli Alford, who represents the former branch, was born at Manchester, England, November 21, 1870. He served an apprenticeship at printing in the office of George Falkner & Son, of his native city, beginning in 1884. He worked in other cities in England, and deposited a traveling card with Providence Union in 1896. In this city his work has been mostly in the book and job offices, but for the last three or four years he has been employed on the newspapers. At present he is with the Evening Bulletin. He has held the office of recording secretary for about one year.

Maurice E. Hughes, the representative of the book and job men, is a native of Johnston, Queens county, N. B., born February 13, 1856. He served his apprenticeship in the News office, St. John, N. B. He worked in Boston and Cambridge, Mass., joining the union in the latter city. He came to Providence in 1884 and worked on the Journal fourteen years, where he learned to operate the linotype. He has been with Snow & Farnham for about five years. Mr. Hughes was admitted to Providence Union by card November 12, 1884, and has been a member ever since.

It would seem that the newspaper men have elected a book and job man, and the book and job men a newspaper man.

The union at its May session elected Edgar O. Beacham to represent it at the convention of the New England allied printing trades, to be held at Fall River.

It also appointed an eight-hour committee, consisting of Herbert S. Richardson, William J. Meegan and Maurice E. Hughes, and gave it the necessary power to act.

A committee of five, consisting of Ephraim Harris, John P. Dorl, M. E. Hughes, George H. Huston and James Graham, was appointed to revise the constitution and by-laws of the union.

A committee of three was appointed to provide a place of meeting for the union at some of the summer resorts on Narragansett bay for the months of June, July and August. The first meeting will be held at Boyden Heights, where the union met once last summer. Probably other resorts will be selected for the July and August meetings.

Bishop McVicker, of the Protestant Episcopal Church of Rhode Island, umpired in a wage dispute between the master builders' association and the carpenters' district council of this city. The latter had asked for an increase of 2½ cents per hour to 37½ cents, or $3 per day of eight hours. The bishop decided in favor of the workmen, and the advance went into effect on June 1.

Charles Ashton, foreman of the Boston Herald stereotype room, was in this city recently. He came to see the new metal pot in the Journal stereotype room, operated by plungers. It is the first of the kind used in New England.

WILLIAM CARROLL.

William Carroll, superintendent of the Journal and Bulletin, is grand chief ranger of the Order of Foresters in this state—a deserved tribute to services well performed.

Peter J. Fitzgerald, a well-known member of the craft, but now engaged in other business, is grand financial secretary of the Foresters. His quiet good humor and courtesy never fail to win esteem, and loyalty to his friends is one of the rules of his life.

A paper in a neighboring city makes the announcement that the linotype machines in use therein are more than half human, and invites the public to come in and see them in operation. The operators thereon must feel like thirty cents.

The People's Forum, of which ex-President William Palmer, of our local union, is chairman, has adjourned its meetings until fall. Some of our members took a lively interest in its deliberations.

Ex-President William Donovan presided at the May meeting of our local. He has the faculty of filling any position to which he may be called with ease and dignity.

John P. Darl nas been elected delegate to the central trades and labor union to fill a vacancy existing therein.

Messrs. Becham, Hughes and Richardson have been appointed a committee to boom the eight-hour day.

When a printer begins to show age, there is a feeling among a certain element of the rank and file that he either ought to retire or be Oslerized.

There has been some discussion in THE JOURNAL over the priority law. Like every other law, it is subject to abuse.

There is nothing connected with any organization that has such a binding effect upon the members as a good, substantial treasury.

"It is a poor shingle that has but one side to it." This familiar saw is applicable to the stand taken by THE JOURNAL that correspondents must have their name in full appended thereto. Why does not every contributor or writer in our daily papers sign his or her name to each article that emanates from their pen? Every one familiar with the inner workings of any institution knows, or ought to know, that there are certain abuses that can only be corrected through publicity. In order to make a determined fight against these, one must be in an independent position if his name is to appear in full in connection with the same. Taffy is all right in its place, but it is decidedly in poor taste where facts are lacking. JAMES MUSPRATT.

EIGHT HOURS AND THE "OPEN SHOP."

These are some of the arguments offered for the eight-hour day to the employers at the Detroit conference:

As progressive citizens you recognize the fact that the hours of labor must be reduced. The power of production has increased much faster than the ability to consume. This results in adding to the number of unemployed, and these must be taken care of either as paupers or as criminals. The fewer there are the better for the country and the happier the people. This may be thought a sentimental view, but in proportion as the idlers are diminished prosperity becomes assured and every one gains. Therefore our effort to secure the eight-hour day, instead of being opposed, should be earnestly aided by sound business judgment.

To illustrate: Would it be wise for a community of one hundred people to allow ten to be idle, especially when they were able and anxious to work? The ten would have to be supported anyhow. Common sense would teach that they should lighten the task of all by sharing in the work, and thus benefit themselves as well as the community.

The fear of unfair competitors should be less today than ever before, because the proportionate number is smaller. We shall continue our endeavors to bring others to the same basis, and would be very glad if employers aided us against the common enemy, at least to the extent of refusing to assist him in any way. We believe the eight-hour day will be a benefit to you as well as to ourselves, and that when it is fairly established you will be glad it was not longer delayed.

In Chicago our scale is but half a cent an hour higher than it was over thirty years ago, and the weekly wages are $1.50 less; yet we only ask a reduction in hours. At the time of the panic of 1873 and for a little while after it was $21 for fifty-nine hours; now it is $19.50 for fifty-four hours. Surely we are entitled to some share of thirty years' progress, and when we ask for the eight-hour day instead of higher wages, it means that we subordinate our right to better compensation to consideration of the general welfare.

When you treat labor as a commodity, the same as paper, ink or printing material, you should be willing to accept any change in the terms of purchase the same as you do in those articles. By giving notice of a change so far in advance, you have been treated with much greater consideration than you receive from dealers in printing material, etc.

The "open shop" question was not discussed at Detroit. Had it been, these arguments would have been offered:

It has been presented as a commercial point of view that the employer should be free to purchase labor of any quality in the open market at all times. To this should be added—"at any price he is able to buy it." The latter proposition must have been so indefensible, or there must have been so little hope of its acceptance, that it is conceded to us there should be a minimum standard of wages. But the abolition of this standard would quickly follow if we agreed to inflict self-injury in the manner you suggest.

It is a common practice in business to contract to use certain articles to the exclusion of others. We have vital reasons for asking that this practice be adopted for agreements with our organization.

Would you not contract to do all the printing for a business house and thus shut out competition, if you could? Why have we not the same right to so dispose of our labor, especially when membership is open to all honest and competent printers?

Should you feel that any agreement must concede you the privilege of employing non-members, it is better for us that none be made at all. We must insist upon our right to refuse to work with non-members. For our own protection and to properly enforce discipline, our organization needs to have exclusive agency when it agrees to furnish labor for the composing room.

An agreement proposing to allow non-members of a contracting union to be employed providing the union scale is paid, and at the same time permitting employers to act individually, regardless of membership in the organization acting for them, is a peculiarly unbalanced document. Think of three parties to an agreement, one of which is rigidly bound, another partly bound, and the third not bound at all. Only utter helplessness could excuse the first party for signing it.

Were we to agree on a scale with you and then allow our members to work for less for a competitor, you would justly complain; yet neither you nor we can prevent non-members from doing so.

The superiority of union labor is suggested as assuring its selection in preference to non-members when the same wages are paid to both; but an agreement of this kind would make it possible for employers, without breaking any pledge, to plan the weakening of our organization. Indeed it must weaken us without any hostile action, since many would become careless about paying dues and fall out of membership. Did these alone suffer for their negligence, we would have less reason for caring; but it affects us all.

The method proposed places a premium on non-membership by guaranteeing the union scale to those who would give no assistance whatever to the organization thus benefiting them; who would injure it by making union discipline difficult, if not impossible, and who could work under the scale whenever they chose without violating any agreement or obligation on their own part. Neither justice nor prudence allows of our so binding ourselves.

Whenever an employer wants to hire a non-member who is honest and capable, we will gladly admit him to membership, that he may share in our responsibilities while enjoying our privileges.

Chicago, Ill. ALEXANDER SPENCER.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.

New Orleans Typographical Union No. 17 celebrated its fifty-third birthday Sunday, May 21, with a monster celebration, a celebration which exceeded any previous effort undertaken by any organization in this city and was the grandest ever held by No. 17. The parade, preceding the banquet, was formed early in the afternoon in front of union headquarters, and, after the band had serenaded the newspapers, it marched to Perfect Union Hall, where the festivities were held.

On the floor of the large hall long tables had been spread, and in the center was placed the main table for the officers of the union and the invited guests. As soon as the guests were seated a photograph was taken of the animated scene. I. A. Strauss, the toastmaster, introduced H. F. Mattox, who made the address of welcome in fitting and graceful terms. Rev. A. Gordon Bakewell, D.D., the venerable and beloved rector of Trinity Chapel, who officiates at all printer functions, from births to deaths, returned hearty thanks to God for blessings and mercies shown. By a most satisfactory arrangement, an arrangement which saved time and prevented the banquet lasting late into the evening, the speakers chosen to respond to the several toasts made their addresses during the serving of the dinner's courses. The bill of fare was one well calculated to tempt one's appetite, and the best things on the market were served under conventional French names. H. J. Askew responded to the first toast, "The International Typographical Union." The principal address of the evening was by President Hudspeth, who dwelt upon the memories attached to the past, with glimpses of brilliant successes and some failures, all of which had been helpful to achieve other victories. In conclusion, the president referred to the eight-hour day. He counseled all the men to stand together to help the job printer, and said that the betterment of the industrial conditions for one meant betterment for all. Hon. L. E. Bentley, an oldtime printer himself, and a member of the union, was a guest at the banquet, and Toastmaster Strauss didn't allow him to escape. Mr. Bentley proved to be the humorist and soon had the boys forgetting their pickings (chicken then being the course). E. S. Satterly spoke on the eight-hour day, and told of the benefits that would follow to the wage-earner were the rule altogether established. J. J. Tucker, vice-president of the union, responded for the newspaper printer. E. F. Deimel spoke for the job printer, and said that the eight-hour law was ardently sought for. At this stage of the proceedings President Hudspeth read a letter from Major William Ingram, business manager of the Shreveport Times and the Baton Rouge Times. Major Ingram regretted his inability to attend the banquet, but wished the union every success. James Beggs, the venerable member of this union, and the oldest surviving charter member, made a few remarks, and said that he hoped to be at many similar gatherings. It was Clarence Parker's task to reply to the toast, "The Ladies," and Mr. Parker acquitted himself with credit. Thomas McGovern, foreman of the Times-Democrat, was called upon, but instead of speaking Mr. McGovern sang a love song, in a full, rich tenor voice, Mr. Tucker, who possesses a fine tenor voice, also sang a sentimental ballad. Thus ended the fourth and probably the last banquet.

No. 17 has taken another forward stride toward fraternal unity—an advancement which is endorsed by every member of this union. The assessment taken for the banquet—5 cents per week per member—will be diverted into a fund for old and indigent members, with proper safeguards as to its disbursement. The committee having the matter in charge is enthusiastic over the idea, and is devising rules and regulations, and judging from the majority of opinions, it will go through with a whoop. This is filling a long-felt want, and it is to be hoped other unions will do the same as No. 17 and thereby take care of their old members, and educate their younger ones with more noble thoughts of future anticipations and benefits.

E. L. Kuhnholtz and C. C. Hendricks were elected delegates, with E. F. Deimel and T. M. Weatherby as alternates. The delegates were instructed to vote with Philadelphia. A resolution to instruct the delegates to take action toward dissolving the Correspondents' Association, the ex-Delegates' Association and all kindred orders was defeated. Better luck next time.

place from the residence of his aunt, Mrs. J. Ennemoser, the same day. The announcement of his death came as a great surprise to his many friends here, who deeply sympathize with his bereaved mother and aunt. The chapel of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat showed its high appreciation of deceased by sending $10 to purchase a floral tribute. Richard Holland, formerly of that paper, who is now on the Picayune, kindly consented to act as its representative at the interment. Although the funeral occurred on Saturday, a large number of printers assembled to do homage to the beloved departed. Mr. Fenn held several offices in this union and was always appointed upon all the important committees during his residence in this city. He was thirty-nine years of age and was born at Centralia, Ill. Mr. Fenn graduated from the Jesuits' College at Kansas City, Mo., and then moved to St. Louis, where he lived until 1892, when he came to New Orleans, again going to St. Louis during the World's Fair. E. G. CLARK.

CLEVELAND, OHIO.

The union label and the eight-hour workday are the two thoughts of the job and book printers at the present writing. Amidst the din of the battle of the great class struggle going on, and the ambitions and the aspirations we may be looking forward to, we must not forget one of our needs, which is shorter hours and more pay for the jobman. We give the employer the label, but is that all? No, we give him our labor, and should give him our support. But does he pay us for our labor or our support? Does he divide the profits of our labor with us, or does he keep 90 per cent of it himself? But we want a field for our label, and should encourage the use of our label, and in that way we can give the employer our support. There was one establishment in the city in March that printed a large catalogue which required the union label on every page. The larger the demand the nearer you will come to making the union label a factor in this great battle for recognition—not as a wage slave, but as a wage earner, with eight hours work and sixteen hours free from toil, and to enjoy the privileges which were intended for him, and not for the employer alone. So, when we come across any printed matter without the label, let us deem it our duty to inform the persons interested that the appearance of the label on the article or printing would meet with our approval and our patronage. Let us try this and help along the eight-hour workday.

The daily World has combined with the News and Herald and is called the World-News.

If they keep on coming in, there will be no non-union printers in town.

M. J. Moriarty, of Kansas City, is working on the World-News.

George Anderson and Frank Reed have both been on the sick list.

No. 53 has already planned for Labor day. Robert McDermott will be the marshal, and we will turn out by chapels.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS.

At its April meeting No. 61 adopted a resolution to the effect that it noticed with pleasure the millers' union label on the packages of Egg-O-See, and requested the manufacturers to see if they could not conveniently get the printers' union label also on the boxes and on the leaflets enclosed therein. (Egg-O-See, be it known, is the new cereal food in green boxes.) On sending this resolution we received an early answer as follows:

DEAR SIRS—We have your favor of the 19th, and wish to thank you for the resolution passed by your union. We have taken the matter up with our printers, and have asked each one of them to place the printers' or typographical union label on all of our printed matter. Our work is all being done in shops where this label is available.

The expense of this to No. 61 was one postage stamp. STEVEN T. BYINGTON.

MILWAUKEE PRINTERS' ASSOCIATION.

We are indebted to the courtesy of Mrs. Martha A. Rounds, widow of the late Sterling P. Rounds (formerly public printer), for the information given below. The excerpts are taken from the Old Oaken Bucket, a temperance publication issued at Milwaukee by S. P. Rounds & Company. The date of this particular issue is May 24, 1851 (Vol II, No. 52). The paper was established at Racine, Wis., about four years earlier, and was removed to Milwaukee early in 1851.

The quoted matter is given verbatim et literatim:

PRINTERS' ASSOCIATION.

As we announce on the first page of our paper—we are the advocates of all "true reform," and as such we will ever battle for what we think is right and just. Now no one will deny, that a reformation is needed in the present management, and manner of conducting Printing Business, in order to secure to the journeyman Printer his just and equitable rights and privileges. A young man, buoyant with many high hopes of future prosperity, commences his apprenticeship—spends the best and most valuable days of his life in acquiring and making himself proficient in the art, and in so doing, instils the seeds of a premature death into his system. Having served his regular time, he goes forth into the world, with the expectation of reaping a reward for his labors as a journeyman. But here bitter disappointment awaits him. He finds his place usurped by those who know scarcely anything of the business—boys and half printers are preferred by avaricious money-loving proprietors, because they will work for much less than he can afford to do, and consequently he is thrown upon the choice of two necessities—to starve or work for poor and inadequate compensation. Thus is one of the noblest of employments—an employment which the world could not well spare—an employment which can boast of having among its members, some of the most talented and learned men of the world, degraded and misused.

Feeling sensibly the effects of this evil, the Printers of this city are forming themselves into an Association, for their mutual protection, "to advance the interests of the profession, and to secure cordiality and general good feeling among the members." This is right, and as it should be; and they can accomplish much good, if they will but persevere, and carry through their project. Unity of action, and energy of purpose is all that is necessary to accomplish their objects, and raise the journeyman Printer to the station he should occupy. The Association has our best and cordial wishes for its success.

Can not some of our Milwaukee brethren look this matter up and tell us what became of the proposed association, if, indeed, it ever materialized? Was it the progenitor of the present Milwaukee Typographical Union? When was the latter formed?

I was told, some years ago—I think John M. Farquhar was my informant—that the first printers' union in the country was formed at Albany, N. Y., and the second was founded in Chicago. I have been unable to learn the date of the formation of the latter. It died a natural death, and a few years later—in 1852—Chicago Typographical Union No. 16 was formed. The first secretary of the National Typographical Union was a Chicago printer, my old schoolmate, Harry H. Whitcomb.

It would, I think, be a fine idea for the delvers into ancient history to trace the beginning and the progress of the trade-union movement among printers. HENRY RUSH BOSS.

CHARLESTON, W. VA.

No. 146 is still up and doing. Almost all the membership are steadily employed, and there is talk of some large additions to the printing capacity of the city.

The new daily—the News—is meeting with a great deal of success and has changed to a seven-day paper.

The Gazette comes out on Sundays with a twenty-four-page paper and colored cover, making quite a citified looking sheet.

It is hoped to have a social affair among the members of our local and their families in the near future, with a view to giving a vigorous boost to the auxiliary, which has been in rather a comatose state for several months past. It would be a great thing for us to have a large organization of the kind here, and we hope it may grow and prosper.

There is talk of quite a party taking the trip to Toronto during the convention, going one way by New York and returning the other by steamer from Buffalo to Cleveland or Toledo. We would like to know of others who would like to go in such a party over this route, as we could make arrangements to go together. D. C. LOVETT, JR.

THERE can not be an abundance of ambition or personal liberty in the life of a man who works for a dollar a day and feeds on the thought of the independence he has because he is not affiliated with a labor organization.—Ex.

FRANK N. GOULD.

In presenting the likeness of Frank N. Gould, who was elected president of Minneapolis Typographical Union No. 42, to the readers of THE JOURNAL, it will enable many oldtime printers to recognize in him one whom they may have met in the uttermost parts of the country. Mr. Gould calls Port Huron, Mich., his home town, and here he first made his acquaintance and was initiated into the mysteries of the craft. As skill came to him, along with it also came the inevitable desire to "rove." Cincinnati, Ohio, was his first love, and here also he was initiated into the bond of unionism and fellowcraft. As there was no organization at Port Huron, Mr. Gould grasped the first opportunity presented to affiliate with what he has since made a life study. His affiliation with No. 3 was made in 1888, and he drew a stipend from the Clark Publishing House, Robert Ogden, foreman. The microbe that seems to assail all printers flourished at this time, and in Mr. Gould found a ready and willing victim—the disease prevalent was touring the country—and after a short stay in the Queen City he, along with the birds in the fall of the year, migrated to the sunny south, and among the places in which he is perhaps best remembered can be mentioned Memphis, New Orleans, and all the most important cities of Texas, more especially San Antonio and Galveston. Tiring of the sunny south and west he struck camp, and in 1893 we find him enrolled as a member in this union. From that date up to the present time he has taken an active interest in things typographical, and it is a question open for debate if there is another member of the union as well posted upon the various phases of scales as Mr. Gould. He has served No. 42 several terms upon its executive board, and one year ago represented this union as delegate to the St. Louis convention. In placing the destinies of No. 42 for the coming year in his hands, the membership has undoubtedly selected the one that is best qualified and fitted for that arduous task. His platform in the campaign, in a measure, consisted of a clock showing the hours of labor from eight to five, with the other hours as indicated by the dial missing. No. 42 has reason to feel proud of its selection, and if there is any one better fitted to give the other side of the question the fight of their lives, he remains unknown to the writer. No compromise is his slogan, and the membership is with him to the end. W. J. ROHR.

FRANK N. GOULD.

A LOST OPPORTUNITY.

In my reminiscences in THE JOURNAL for June, I stated that I left Selma, Ala., a week after General Wilson's departure. And right there I slipped up; for if I had remained only a short time longer it is almost certain that I would have had an outing of some months' duration under the watchful guardianship and at the expense of the United States government, and at the end of the picnic have received a nice little wad of greenbacks as per diem, to say nothing of the fame or notoriety incident to being held as a witness against a man suspected, with all reason, of being a party to the assassination of President Lincoln. All this fell to the fortune of two other printers whose home was Selma, and consequently were on hand when wanted.

At some time in the latter part of 1864 there appeared in the Selma Despatch an advertisement signed by a lawyer named Elyag, living in Cahaba, some ten miles below Selma, in which the subscriber offered a reward of $20,000 to the man or men who would go to Washington and procure the removal of President Lincoln, by abduction or murder. It would be too tedious to explain just why this offer was intended only as a banter or joke; but such it was, and having answered its purpose was forgotten, until the assassination actually occurred, when the matter took an entirely different phase. However, that the authorities were convinced of the innocence of Mr. Elyag is evidenced by the fact that, although detained in different prisons for several months, he was finally released without ever having been put on trial.

As soon as the tragedy in Washington occurred the federal officer in command at Selma (having seen or been informed of the "ad") sent a detachment to Cahaba to gather in Mr. Elyag, and at the same time he began to look around for witnesses against him. These he found in the persons of John Cantly, who had been the foreman of the Despatch, and Watkins Graves, an apprentice. Unless my memory is greatly at fault, I put the "ad" in type; so if I have not been too "previous" in my departure I would have been roped in, too. It must not be assumed, however, that Cantly and Graves were witnesses of the "swift" variety, for the officials, in order to make sure of them, put them upon the same footing as the prisoner, so far as restraint and treatment was concerned.

As all railroads of the south were out of business just then, the party was sent by river steamer to Mobile, thence to New Orleans, where they were placed on board a transport and carried to New York. From this latter city they were sent to Washington, and had quarters in the "old capitol" prison while the Surratt trial was in progress. Somewhere about the 1st of July, 1865, the party was transferred to Augusta, Ga. Up to this time there had been no distinction in the treatment of prisoner and witnesses; but on arriving at Augusta Cantly and Graves were allowed their liberty on parole. They remained in Augusta until some time in September, when Elyag, Cantly and Graves were all released and returned to Alabama. The case against Elyag was either nolle prossed or he put under bond—I forget, if I ever knew which; at any rate, that was the last of it. I do not know whether the prisoner got any compensation for his time and trouble, but Cantly and Graves did, and as no harm had come to their companion through them, they had no regrets at the outcome of an affair into which they had entered unwillingly.

Atlanta, Ga. E. GUTHRIE.

WILMINGTON, DEL.

The good work still goes on, and we are able to report progress in almost every branch.

The slow advance into summer is not making any apparent difference in the condition of trade. It still remains very good, with a chance of holding so during the usually slack period.

The label was, during the past month, granted to the George E. King Press, and an application for its use made by A. B. Vernon, of the Daily Republican. The latter will gather another newspaper into the fold, and the membership here are hoping to finally induce the one non-union paper remaining to come into our ranks and be one of us.

J. L. Roediger, a representative from No. 2, addressed our members at the last meeting on the Inquirer question, and asked that No. 123 expend some vigorous efforts to induce present readers of the unfair sheet to read a paper which is favorable to organized labor. He is staying in our midst for a short while to visit all branches of organized labor and enlist them in the fight. From Mr. Roediger's remarks there is evidently a lack of information as to the situation and conditions in Wilmington, and, let me say, the large subscription list of the Inquirer here is due to a political cause, and not from a lack of interest in the question by the local union. A series of meetings is being held, under the auspices of the allied trades, at the corner of Fifth and Market streets, and has attracted considerable attention.

An order was drawn for $5 donation to the Cummings memorial fund, and closes up the amount which our local had pledged itself to give.

The eight-hour committee organized by electing David H. Russell chairman and George H. Hoage secretary. Some quiet work has been done, and promises to be of considerable help when the test comes. Our contributions to the fund are growing gradually, and we are in hopes of turning the half of them to the treasurer of the International fund.

We have received a number of the eight-hour buttons, and they certainly are beauties. The designer brought out strongly the main point—eight hours, January 1.

Our secretary-treasurer, A. O. H. Grier, who will represent us at the Toronto convention, is making arrangements in advance to insure his being present. He is a quiet sort of a chap to talk to, but he has the true Delaware spirit—when he begins a task for the benefit of the union he never gets scared and runs away. He will be there to vote on every question which betters in any way the condition of his fellow workers.

The tramp printer, passing his card from office to office for donations, has become very rare here. Let us hope it is so in all parts of our great land, and earnestly pray that the bettering conditions will finally do away with it entirely. Shorter hours means more work for the subs, and those who really want work will be better able to secure it. Let us keep in mind the lines of that old, familiar hymn:

"Work, for the night is coming
When man's work is done."

Yours for the eight hours, D. H. RUSSELL.

SALT LAKE, UTAH.

C. H. Fenstermaker has resigned the assistant foremanship of the Tribune and has gone to Los Angeles via Portland and San Francisco. His old position of assistant foreman is being filled by Harry Glenn.

No. 115 elected the following officers: President, Henry Russell; vice-president, Sidney Groo; delegate, H. R. Freeman; secretary, Abner Thompson; sergeant-at-arms, John Priestly. Abner Thompson fought harder for this honor than any other successful candidate, receiving a plurality of only four votes over George G. Welles. The delegate was voted $200 for expenses.

The unusual accident that befell Harry C. Hammond, of Denver, through bringing a lighted match, a pipe and a celluloid eyeshade into too close intimacy, is one to arouse the sympathy and consideration of all eyeshade wearers. But men have taken greater risks than wearing eyeshades of inflammable composition, and still lived out the Biblical allotment of three score and ten. Printers take many risks greater than that and laugh at them. There no longer is any dispute that tuberculosis is a highly infectious disease, communicable through the medium of dried sputum; yet nearly every printshop in this country at some time has had infected sputum deposited upon its walls or floor. Carelessness of the kind cited by Mr. Hammond has brought to light but one serious accident. I have heard of a man who ignited a celluloid collar about his neck, but the chief result of that accident was to save him the price of a haircut. Dozens of printers every year are started on the road to a hopeless and lingering disease through the carelessness or ignorance of unfortunate brethren in depositing tubercle bacilli in close and crowded workrooms. Dozens of men, today in good health, who some day will have the words "tuberculosis," "phthisis" or "consumption" entered in THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL as the causes of their deaths, will not give as much as their votes to chapel measures prohibiting promiscuous expectoration, and laugh to scorn the efforts of reformers along that line. Yet tuberculosis kills one out of every seven of the earth's population, and a still greater proportion of printers. Chapel dues are collected to pay for soap, towels, ice, etc.; why not collect another 50 cents a week and pay to have the office floor scrubbed occasionally and to supply cuspidors to the expectorators and compel them to expectorate therein?

A new departure for the Tribune and the Telegram is the label at the head of their editorial columns.

Provo, the home of Senator Reed Smoot, is rejoicing over the fact that Thomas Chamberlain has moved to that city from another part of the state. Mr. Chamberlain is the husband of four wives and the father of fifty-four children. Fifty of his children are living and all of his wives, so his moving to Provo means the addition of fifty-five people to the population. Mr. Chamberlain is but forty-eight years of age.

If Mr. Kreiter, of Washington, will stop off in Salt Lake on his way to the Lewis and Clark exposition at Portland, I shall take pleasure in demonstrating that in at least one piece-system town fast operators are no more conspicuous than slow ones. There are three or four very fast operators working here, but there are just as many very slow ones; the general run are good average men. Several men who stand well here in the latter class were too slow for some time offices they tried to work in. Speaking from my own personal experience, I have worked in but two time offices (out of fifty) where the foremen were not continually hectoring me to set more type. On a Denver paper the foreman one night used insulting language because it took me an hour and twenty minutes to set (and correct) 10,000 brevier. In Colorado Springs one Saturday, fifteen minutes before the close of a double-header (sixteen hours), copy ran out and the foreman told me I could go, but to make up the fifteen minutes some afternoon in the week. I work shorter hours here than I ever worked in any time office, work easier and receive about $1 a day more.

The opening of the new direct route of railway between Salt Lake and Los Angeles has been the occasion of much fraternizing between the two cities. First a delegation of Salt Lake business men and city officials visited the winter resort. That visit was returned in kind, though in much larger numbers, by the pushing Los Angelenes. The local papers spread themselves on the latter occasion. The day of the arrival of our California neighbors, though it was a Monday, the Herald and the Tribune printed Sunday-size editions. The Tribune surprised the natives and visitors with facsimile reproductions of the first pages of the three Los Angeles morning dailies of the same date. As the two cities are eight hundred miles apart, this was no mean achievement. In the Tribune chapel there was some discussion as to whether the members were warranted in setting matter for the reproduced page of the Los Angeles Times. Not wishing to hamper the management at such a time, the case being so exceptional, the work was done; but the men refused pay therefor and referred the matter to the executive committee, which has written to President Lynch for an opinion.

At its last meeting No. 115 received a delegation from the Utah Federation of Labor. The delegation urged us to send delegates to the federation.

Digitized by Google

The federation question in Salt Lake is rather mixed. No. 115 and several other labor organizations last year withdrew from the Utah State Federation, composed mainly of the Western Federation of Miners, because of the socialistic tendency of that body. Later on it appeared that the socialists were about to control the Utah Federation of Labor, and our delegates became lukewarm in attending its sessions. Some of us even got the impression that the two federations were virtually the same thing. To dissipate this impression was the purpose of the delegation from the Utah federation. That purpose was accomplished, the union voting to send delegates and authorizing the president to appoint same. There are many socialists in the Utah federation, and, as in the case of the state federation, "we shall see what we shall see."

It is interesting to read of Senator W. A. Clark's "finest private residence in the world" in New York. One description says there are 101 bedrooms and twenty bathrooms. The latter are lined with opaque glass, at a cost of $3,000 each for that one item, and five of them are for the exclusive use of servants. Fifteen thousand dollars for the sake of greater cleanliness and beauty in the servants' baths alone! Ye gods! Any one who has ever worked in the subterranean chamber of tortures in which is produced Mr. Clark's Salt Lake newspaper will have cause for wonder. Picture a long, narrow room on the ground floor, cut off in front by the business office, with little light, less air and no cleanliness. Fifteen thousand dollars for opaque glass to brighten the servants' baths in New York, and not $50 to install some ventilating apparatus to mitigate the inhuman conditions with which he surrounds his employes in Salt Lake. This paper is to have a new building, but the composing room employes will still be expected to live without fresh air, the business manager being firm in his intention to house them in another cave. Mr. Clark's paper, strange to say, is always throwing stones at the health officers and other people who do not keep clean. An employe of that paper who has metallic poisoning was asked by his physician why the paper did not practice what it preached. Why not? Its employes, evidently, are expected not to believe anything the paper says.

The eight-hour day in Salt Lake goes into effect July 1. We are marching on.

To Mr. Cooke, of Boston: I may be a little mixed on this priority question, but assure you I am seeking only for the truth. The law says: "Persons considered capable as substitutes by foremen shall be deemed competent to fill regular situations." If a man is competent to work for a regular a week or a month, why isn't he competent to work as a regular himself? If a man isn't competent to sub, a foreman may discharge him; the fact that he is permitted to sub is evidence of his ability to fill a regular situation, and a warrant for his claim upon that situation if he is the oldest sub in point of service in the office. The law has always been construed and enforced along that line in Salt Lake. We have no local priority law. The appeal cited was made to No. 115 from a ruling of its president. The president was almost unanimously sustained. Appeal was then taken to President Lynch. The ruling appealed from was a construction of section 95, general laws, to mean that the "oldest sub in an office should be given the first regular situation." President Lynch sustained No. 115 and its president, ruling that the "oldest competent sub should have the first regular situation." There are very few men who are competent to sub who are not equally competent to fill regular situations. In many offices subs are put to severer tests of competency than regulars.

THE BEACHIAN LIBRARY.

For the benefit of those contemplating forming a library, however humble, I will give a list of most of the books which have found a place in my own library: "The Historians' History of the world," in twenty-five imperial volumes; "History for Ready Reference;" Chambers's "Cyclopedia of English Literature," latest edition; Lossing's "Cyclopedia of United States History," two volumes; "The Nature Library," ten volumes; Dr. John Lord's "Beacon Lights of History," fifteen volumes; John Fiske's historical writings, twelve volumes; Emerson's complete works, twelve volumes; Guizot's "History of France;" John Lothrop Motley's historical works; Gibbon's "History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," Harper's edition; Shakespeare's works, twenty volumes, edited by Prof. W. J. Rolfe, the eminent American Shakespearean scholar; Mark Twain's works, twenty-three volumes; "The Encyclopedia of Social Reforms," Funk & Wagnalls Company; C. E. Little's "Historical Lights;" Sloane's "Life of Napoleon Bonaparte," four volumes; James Parton's "Life of Horace Greeley;" Paul Leicester Ford's "The Many-Sided Franklin;" Sydney George Fisher's "The True Benjamin Franklin;" "The Autobiography of Benjamin Franklin," in the Century Classics; Zabriskie's "Horace Greeley;" Carlos Martyn's "Wendell Phillips;" Boswell's "Life of Dr. Samuel Johnson," three volumes, J. M. Dent & Co., London; Sir Leslie Stephen's "History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century" and his "Hours in a Library;" W. E. H. Lecky's "History of the Rise of the Spirit of Rationalism in Europe" and his "History of European Morals;" Dr. Andrew D. White's "History of the Warfare of Science with Theology in Christendom;" Montesquieu's "Spirit of Laws;" Bulfinch's "Age of Fable;" Herbert Spencer's "Principles of Ethics" and his "Study of Sociology;" Mill's "International Geography;" James G. Fernald's "English Synonyms, Antonyms and Prepositions" and his "Connectives of English Speech;" Rossiter Johnson's "The Alphabet of Rhetoric;" George H. Putnam's "Authors and Their Public in Ancient Times" and his "Books and Their Makers During the Middle Ages;" Charles R. Hildeburn's "Sketches of Printers and Printing in Colonial New York;" Horatio F. Brown's "The Venetian Printing Press," printed from type by the Chiswick Press, London (limited to 525 copies); Bartlett's "Familiar Quotations;" De Tocqueville's "Democracy in America;" Green's "Short History of the English People;" James A. Froude's "Cæsar;" White's "The Natural History of Selborne;" Edmund Burke's selected "Orations and Essays;" Thomas De Quincey's "Confessions of an English Opium-Eater, Literary Reminiscences" (one volume); Edward S. Creasy's "Decisive Battles of the World;" Homer's "Iliad" (Pope); "Memoirs of Benvenuto Cellini," translated by John A. Symonds; (the last nine works belong to that admirable series, Appleton's "World's Great Books"); Horace Greeley's "The American Conflict;" poetical works of Tennyson, Byron, Shelley and Whittier; Robert G. Ingersoll's "Prose Poems and Selections;" "Red-Letter Poems;" Buckle's "History of Civilization in England;" James Parton's "Smoking and Drinking;" Thomas H. Huxley's "Ethical and Other Essays;" Oliver Wendell Holmes's Breakfast Table series; an Oxford Bible, in brevier type; the Standard Dictionary, latest edition, in one volume.

Of famous novels and tales I have not a few. For example, these, depicting the manners and customs of different periods of English and Irish society: The Sir Roger de Coverley papers, originally appearing in the London Spectator, and mostly written by Addison and Steele; Oliver Goldsmith's "Vicar of Wakefield;" Henry Mackenzie's "The Man of Feeling;" Henry Fielding's "Joseph Andrews;" Smollett's "Humphry Clinker;" Jane Austen's "Pride and Prejudice;" Maria Edgeworth's "Castle Rackrent" and her "The Absentee;" Benjamin Disraeli's "Coningsby;" Samuel Richardson's "Pamela;" Charlotte Bronte's "Jane Eyre;" Anthony Trollope's "Barchester Towers;" Charles Reade's "It Is Never Too Late to Mend;" Wilkie Collins's "The Moonstone," and Charles Lever's "The Confessions of Harry Lorrequer."

I have the complete works of Washington Irving, the best-beloved author in the history of American letters, whose every page exudes sweetness and light, and whose writings are "the delight of childhood, the chivalrous companion of refined womanhood, the solace of old age, and an imperishable legacy of grace and beauty to his countrymen."

The most valuable and useful set of books which I have is "History for Ready Reference." This admirable work was first published in 1895 in five imperial volumes, but another volume has since been added, bringing the History down to the year 1901. The work was edited by Josephus Nelson Larned, the original five volumes while he was librarian of the Buffalo Public Library, and the contents of the sixth volume by the same master mind. The History's topical headings and system of references and cross-references make it one of the most valuable works of the kind ever devised by the genius of man. In fact, I consider it the most valuable and useful reference work ever printed in the English language. To the man with a growing family of boys and girls, to the student of history, to the busy man of affairs, and to the workingman who would inform himself concerning all the great social and political movements, discoveries and inventions, arts and sciences, trade and labor movements, laws and polities, literatures and religions which have contributed toward the amelioration and elevation of man, this work is alike indispensable. "History for Ready Reference" is the very best investment which any American could make in the line of books. (The Charles A. Nichols Company, Springfield, Mass.)

There are many books that I would like to have, but my treasury will not stand the strain which their acquisition would involve.

In the proofroom of the Chronicle I have the Century Cyclopedia of Names, Jameson's Cyclopedia of United States History, Adams's Dictionary of American Authors, Bartlett's "Familiar Quotations," H. P. Jones's "New Dictionary of Foreign Phrases," A. C. McClurg's (Chicago) Catalogue, the latest United States Official Postal Guide, and the Students' Standard Dictionary.

I know a little French and less Greek, but I do not yearn to be able to read any foreign book in a foreign language. Excepting a few books on the French language, all my books are in English. I am disposed to agree with Emerson when he says that he would as soon think of swimming the Charles river to get to Boston as of reading a foreign book in the original when a good translation thereof was at hand.

Any English-speaking person capable of appreciating the splendid diction of such writers as John Milton, Joseph Addison, Edward Gibbon, Thomas B. Macaulay, David Hume, William Hazlitt, Thomas De Quincey, W. E. H. Lecky, Herbert Spencer, Alfred Tennyson, Lord Byron, W. M. Thackeray, Sir Leslie Stephen, John Morley, James Anthony Froude, Edward A. Freeman, George Eliot, Archdeacon Frederic W. Farrar, Thomas Carlyle, William H. Prescott, Andrew D. White, Thomas Bailey Aldrich, Rev. James Freeman Clarke, John Lothrop Motley, John Fiske, James Russell Lowell, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Edgar Allan Poe, Washington Irving, Nathaniel Hawthorne, Francis Parkman, James Parton and William M. Sloane can be pardoned for regarding English as the noblest language in the world.

Archdeacon Farrar was one of the most brilliant rhetoricians and logicians that the world has ever known. E. g., his "Life and Work of the Apostle Paul." He is one of the great authorities on English, as his various books will attest. His works are highly esteemed by students of the English language and literature.

Sloane's "Life of Napoleon Bonaparte" is one of the most brilliant works ever written.

TARRYTOWN-OSSINING, N. Y.

The second annual banquet of local No. 523, which was held on the evening of Wednesday, May 17, proved to be a very enjoyable and profitable affair. That night a party of twenty, members and guests, gathered at the home of William H. Oliver, the Ossining caterer, where the members first proceeded to the important business of electing a delegate and alternate to the International convention.

After the election the company was entertained by Frank May, of Yonkers, ably assisted by the president and other members. Mr. May's work was especially good, his imitation of "Tom" Billington's automobile causing much laughter.

Soon, but not too soon, the welcome call to dinner was heard, and all repaired to the banquet room. To say that the diners did justice to the repast would be a very moderate expression—two helpin's was the general rule, some members making away with three without turning a hair—and they were big platefuls, too.

When the decks were cleared cigars were lighted and the entertainment was resumed. Mr. May gave several good imitations and rendered several songs, the company joining in the choruses.

Shortly after this the evening's celebration concluded with the singing of "Good Night, Beloved," by the entire company, and everybody started for home thoroughly satisfied with themselves and the world at large. Thus ended the second annual banquet of No. 523, which has proved far more enjoyable and profitable than the previous one.

The success of the affair was chiefly due to the efforts of Arthur Billington, chairman of the committee in charge, ably seconded by his associates and Hubert H. Cullen, president of the union.

WILLIAM W. LEE.

ORANGE, N. J.

That the "open shop" policy is a serious menace to employers as well as employes was demonstrated recently in the town of Montclair. The employers in this case were master masons and builders, and the futility of their attempt to conduct "open shops" has been an object lesson to them and will prove a warning to other employes to fight shy of the "open shop." The knockout blow was administered by the laborers' union of Montclair and vicinity, after a strike lasting eleven months, which was one of the most stubbornly contested that has ever been carried on in labor circles in this section. The strike was due to an attempt of the bosses to reduce wages from $2.80 to $2.40 a day and to declare in favor of the "open shop." Other trades refused to work on buildings where non-union labor was employed, and consequently thousands of dollars' worth of work was lost by the bosses.

The following appeared in a recent issue of the Newark Sunday Call, and speaks for itself: "An invitation to join in opposition to an eight-hour day for printers is respectfully declined by the Sunday Call. We believe in shorter hours for workingmen, and maintain the eight-hour plan in this office. Some time we hope to include the nonmechanical departments in the arrangement."

A call for a meeting, issued by the eight-hour committee of No. 103, of Newark, of representatives from the different locals throughout the state, resulted in a meeting in Orange May 21, and the formation of a permanent organization, to be known as the State Eight-Hour Committee. The following officers were elected: President, F. J. Lampe, Newark; vice-president, Adam Gunther, Orange; secretary-treasurer, C. W. Van Skiver, Union Hill. Meetings will be held every three weeks in various parts of the state, and the committee feel that by having a general discussion and the advancing of ideas and opinions it will prove of material assistance to all concerned.

Organizer McLoughlin was an interested visitor at the meeting of the various eight-hour committees of the state in Orange May 21.

That a vigorous label agitation will prove a good means toward paving the way for the eight-hour day is beginning to manifest itself to some optimistic members of No. 424. Our label committee has been doing energetic work, and now nearly all our members are booming the label. Briefly, our line of action is on the following, and the hint was taken from THE JOURNAL columns a few months back: We had a number of cards printed, and a member on making a purchase handed one to the clerk or proprietor of the store. The card contained the names of the label offices and in two or three display lines stated that the customer (the printer) would like to see the storekeeper reciprocate by having the label on his printing. It met with instantaneous response. Business men who have their printing done in label offices are now demanding the label on their stationery.

The summer dullness is now on. Meanwhile we are looking carefully to our defenses, and when the great pow-wow begins October 1 we feel quite confident it will be of short duration, and THE JOURNAL will be the silent messenger to spread the good news of our victory to all other sister unions throughout the International jurisdiction.

T. F. NIHILL.

HOLYOKE, MASS.

Well, that "What We Are Doing" column in the June JOURNAL was rather imposing with its eight-hour happenings. Let us hope it will be that way every month until we have them all in the fold.

The "President's Page" in the June JOURNAL is certainly interesting, and should be read with profit by all members of the craft—and it might do others good if they could and would digest it.

There are great possibilities in that suggestion of Brother Cooke, of Boston. Mass meetings of printers held in all the larger cities of New England, one after another, with good speakers, would be a great factor in getting the nons into our organization. It certainly needs something of this nature, where eminent craftsmen, strangers to the locality, would be able to draw large interested audiences, with the result that the work of organizing for the eight-hour day would be helped wonderfully.

An order to give city laborers Saturday afternoon off was recently passed by the board of aldermen, but was vetoed by the mayor, as the order as passed was illegal. Alderman Noonan, ex-president of No. 253, was father of the order, and intends to bring the matter before the board again with the hope of having it passed.

Here's hoping President Lynch will be able to visit Holyoke on his eastern trip. The members of No. 253 will be glad to meet him.

The teamsters' union is bracing up after its recent hard luck and is getting in new members. It is hoped that any member of No. 253 having any work in their line done will demand of the driver that he be a member of the teamsters' union in order to secure his patronage.

MINNESOTA STATE FEDERATION.

The twenty-third annual convention of the Minnesota State Federation of Labor closed on June 14, after three days' session, at which much business was transacted.

Of most importance to the printing trade was a resolution passed unanimously endorsing the stand taken by the International Typographical Union for an eight-hour day and pledging it moral and financial support if needed. Besides this there was elected president of the federation William Templeman, a member of Typographical Union No. 30, of St. Paul;-also two of our craft on the federa-i n council; so you will see we are well represented in this organization. It is hard to say whether these elections happened on account of the popularity of the individuals or the sympathy of the federation for our cause; but at any rate it goes to show the standing our members have in the ranks of organized labor here.

There were present at the convention about 200 delegates and the proceedings were unusually interesting all the time. One of the most important steps taken was to endorse and recommend political action by all unions affiliated with this body. This measure, however, was so framed that it does not sanction introducing politics into the union meetings, but does sanction and requests unions to organize outside of their unions for political purposes, sanctioning any man in any party who is disposed to be friendly to organized labor, or, where it seems practical, put its own candidates in the field.

There were many other important measures carried, but none of particular interest to our craft.

Duluth, Minn. JOHN McDONALD.

BUTTE, MONT.

State of trade fair. Cards received since last report: E. Peterson, Spokane; J. G. Rickard, St. Louis; Paul Evans, Topeka; Emile Zschan, an old-time Butte boy, and W. J. Hauser, Anaconda.

L. G. Maskery, of the Miner ad alley, has taken his other shirt out of the laundry and accepted (we use the term advisedly) a situation in Missoula.

P. J. Geraghty, foreman of the Daily Miner, took advantage of excursion rates and visited coast cities, taking in the fair at Portland. George Reich, foreman of the Miner job rooms, contemplates a similar trip.

What's the matter with our 'Frisco correspondent? After telling the tourists that work is slim, why not let it go at that? Tourists are not as a rule looking for situations. They simply want to see the country.

The printers of Butte did themselves proud on Miners' Union day. Every man who could possibly get off was in line.

Ex-President Purnett has proven himself a manager par excellence. The young lady whom he supported for the gratuitous Portland fair trip won, hands down, and picked up a silk dress pattern on the track. But William wears his honors modestly—that is one of his qualifications.

In Memoriam

CHARLES I. HEDGES.

Charles I. Hedges, a job printer, who had been a member of Newburgh (N. Y.) Union No. 305 since February, 1903, died Sunday, June 4, of consumption. Mr. Hedges was last employed in the office of the Commercial Printing Company up to last fall, when he was compelled by ill health to give up his position. He is survived by his wife and two children. Mr. Hedges was also a member of the Senior Order of United American Mechanics.

E. B. VANDERHOEF.

The following resolutions were adopted by Lansing (Mich.) Union No. 72:

In the death of Brother Vanderhoef No. 72 loses an earnest and efficient member of nearly twenty years' standing, and his family their dearest friend.

We extend our heartfelt sympathy and condolence to the family and friends in their bereavement.

Resolved, That these resolutions be spread upon the minutes and published in THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL; also a copy of same furnished the family of Brother Vanderhoef.

MICHAEL J. SULLIVAN.

The following resolutions were adopted at the last regular meeting of Manchester Typographical Union No. 152:

Whereas, The all-wise God has seen fit to remove from us our fellow craftsman and a beloved husband and father, Michael J. Sullivan;

Whereas, We, the officers and member of Typographical Union No. 152, desiring to record our feelings of respect and esteem for our friend and coworker; therefore, be it

Resolved, That in this, the darkest hour of sorrow, we extend our heartfelt sympathy to the family in their great bereavement, and commend them to the ever-watchful Father, who shares the sorrows and makes light the burdens of those in grief bowed down.

Resolved, That these resolutions be sent to the family and a copy spread upon our records, and a copy be sent to THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL.

R. W. WEEKS.

Rufus W. Weeks, a native of Auburn, N. Y., and a member of Oakland Typographical Union No. 46, was drowned at Bartee's Bar, on the north fork of the Feather river, in the Sierra Nevada mountains, Butte county, California, April 29, 1905.

Deceased was a son of George F. Weeks, an old-time printer of Auburn, Rochester, New York, San Francisco, etc. At the time of his death he was employed by a power company in stretching a cable across the river, which is a treacherous, rapid mountain torrent. He was called upon to perform a dangerous duty, which others present refused, but he responded bravely and lost his life in consequence.

He was a member of Liscum Camp of Spanish War Veterans, having served in the Eighth California Regiment during that conflict, and was buried by that body in the soldiers' plot at Mountain View Cemetery, Oakland, on Sunday, May 21, his body having only been recovered after a search of eighteen days, headed by his father and brother. A delegation from Oakland Typographical Union participated in the funeral.

Deceased was twenty-nine years of age at the time of his untimely death.

PATRICK J. POWER.

The following resolutions were passed at a meeting of the members of the Municipal Printing Plant chapel of Boston, Mass.:

Whereas, Death has removed our friend and fellow worker, Patrick J. Power, who departed this life on Thursday, May 25, 1905, leaving a record of unsullied devotion to the principles of trade unionism and of helpfulness to those in distress; therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the members of the chapel of the Municipal Printing Plant, sincerely mourning the loss of our late associate, extend to the widow and children our heartfelt sympathy in this the time of their great affliction.

Resolved, That these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of the chapel and published in THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL, and that copies be sent to members of the family of the deceased.

W. W. STEWART.

Detroit Typographical Union No. 18 expresses sympathy in the following resolutions:

Whereas, William W. Stewart, a valued member of Detroit Typographical Union No. 18, has been called from our midst by an inscrutable Providence; and

Whereas, It is fitting that suitable recognition should be made of those qualities which have endeared him to the members of the craft; therefore,

Resolved, That in the death of Brother Stewart we sustain the loss of a true and worthy friend, his family the loss of a devoted husband and father; and

Resolved, That while we mourn the loss of our friend and associate, we extend our heartfelt sympathy to the bereaved relatives; and

Resolved, That this testimonial of sympathy be forwarded to the family, spread upon the records of Detroit Typographical Union No. 18, and published in THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL, and that our charter be draped in mourning for thirty days.

FRANKLIN A. HENRY.

At a regular meeting of St. Louis Typographical Union No. 8, held June 4, 1905, the following resolutions were adopted by a rising vote upon the death of Franklin A. Henry:

Whereas, The hand of death has entered our ranks and removed our esteemed friend and fellow worker, Franklin A. Henry, in the very bloom of energetic, ambitious young manhood; and

Whereas, Mr. Henry was a stanch friend of organized labor, a skilled workman, a genial companion and a faithful friend; therefore, be it

Resolved, That in his sudden removal from our midst this union has sustained a great loss, and his memory will ever be cherished by those who knew him;

Resolved, That we extend to his bereaved family our heartfelt sympathy in the loss of such a faithful and loving son and brother;

Resolved, As a further token of our esteem, that these resolutions be spread upon the records, a copy posted in the chapel for thirty days, a copy furnished to the stricken mother, and also to THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL and Typographical News.

WILLIAM WALLACE SMITH.

Colorado Springs Typographical Union No. 82, in the decease of William Wallace Smith, has lost one of its oldest and stanchest friends and unionism one of its ablest exponents.

Mr. Smith was one of those unique characters of which the printing business furnishes so many, whose wit, geniality and kindly charitableness toward erring humanity fixed and kept him in the highest esteem among his fellow workmen. He was a charter member of No. 82, and in point of service was about one of the oldest as well as ablest in the jurisdiction.

How many young tourists on their way coastward affectionately remember "Billie" Smith!

After a long and painful illness from a malignant tumor in the throat, Mr. Smith passed peacefully away at his home, surrounded by old and true friends, and is survived only by a devoted wife and son.

"Wrapping the drapery of his couch about him, he lay down to pleasant dreams."

Since there were so few like him, he will not soon be forgotten.

FRANK N. SUTLIFF.

Pasadena (Cal.) No. 583 passed the following resolutions on the death of F. N. Sutliff:

Whereas, In the death of our lamented brother, Frank N. Sutliff, Pasadena Typographical Union No. 583 feels that they have sustained a real loss; and

Whereas, Devotion to the principles of unionism such as he exhibited, together with a high order of intelligence and an accurate and thorough knowledge of the history, aims and purposes of the International Typographical Union, make his loss keenly felt by his fellow members of this union; therefore, be it

Resolved, That we express our sincere sorrow at the death of our brother, Frank N. Sutliff, and tender our heartfelt sympathy to his bereaved wife and brothers in the loss of a loving husband and brother; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be furnished the widow of our deceased brother; that they also be spread upon the minutes, and a copy furnished THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL for publication, and further, that the charter of this union be draped in mourning for a period of sixty days.

THOMAS GILBERT.

This gentleman was one of the oldest and best known employing printers in the south. At a meeting of Columbus (Ga.) Typographical Union No. 220 the following resolutions were adopted:

Death has again invaded the ranks of this organization and removed a proficient journeyman and an upright, kind and just employer.

In the death of Thomas Gilbert, sr., the compositors of this city, both individually and collectively, have lost a friend whose place can never be filled, a man of unblemished honor and integrity, and an employer who possessed in the fullest sense that golden index to character—the admiration, love and respect of his every employe.

Himself a journeyman at our occupation, who had experienced all its difficulties, its hardships and its temptations, he rose from meagerness to competency, and through it all carried with him a card of membership in our honorable organization.

He knew the printer's ambitions and ideals, and never in his long and honorable career had he aught but a sympathetic interest and kindly assurance for his fellow craftsmen and his employes.

Be it resolved by Columbus Typographical Union, That we extend to his bereaved family our sincere and tender sympathy in this dark hour of grief, and would make it lighter with the thought that the effulgence of his noble life must reflect upon a brighter shore as a beacon for their guidance.

Resolved, further, That as a token of respect a page of our minutes be dedicated to his memory, our charter be draped in mourning for a term of six months, and that we attend his funeral in a body.

Resolved, further, That his family be furnished with a copy of these resolutions, and that they be printed in the local press and in THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL.

PATRICK J. M'HUGH.

The following resolutions were adopted by St. Paul (Minn.) Typographical Union No. 30 at the May meeting:

Whereas, On the 28th of March, 1905, our Heavenly Father saw fit to remove from this earth one of the stanchest members of No. 30, Patrick J. McHugh; and

Whereas, While we realize the works of God are inscrutable and it is the destiny of all to die, yet his early death was a shock to his associates; therefore, be it

Resolved, That the condolences of the members of No. 30 be extended to the devoted wife and family in their bereavement.

Resolved, That these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of this union, a copy be sent to the family of deceased, and published in THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL.

Resolved, further, That as a mark of respect to his memory our charter be draped in mourning for a period of thirty days.

JOHN R. ACHUFF.

At the meeting of Streator Typographical Union No. 328 the following resolutions were adopted:

Whereas, God in His infinite wisdom has removed from his chosen field of labors our friend and brother, John R. Achuff; and

Whereas, Streator Typographical Union No. 328, in the death of Mr. Achuff, has lost an earnest, competent and conscientious member and the cause of unionism a stanch and true advocate; and

Whereas, It is fitting that we should show our appreciation of the many good qualities of one who was so well known to us all; therefore, be it

Resolved, That this union here records its esteem of its departed brother and sincerely mourns his death; and be it further

Resolved, That this union does convey to the family of the deceased its heartfelt sorrow and deepest sympathy, while they bow with submission to Him who doeth all things well; and be it further

Resolved, That our charter be appropriately draped for a period of thirty days, and that a copy of these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of this union in memory of our late brother.

E. W. PATTON.

The following resolutions were adopted by Columbia Typographical Union at its meeting held June 18, 1905:

Whereas, It has pleased the Ruler of the Universe to call from our midst on May 4, 1905, E. W. Patton, a fellow delegate to the central labor union and an honored member of Columbia Typographical Union No. 101; and

Whereas, It is but just that we express our appreciation of his manly qualities and his untiring efforts to benefit his fellow man; that in publishing a labor paper of high standard, ever espousing the cause of labor, he rendered a service to organized labor of inestimable value; therefore, be it

Resolved, That in the death of E. W. Patton Columbia Union No. 101 mourns the loss of a faithful member and organized labor generally an earnest advocate and true friend.

Resolved, further, That a copy of these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of this union, a copy furnished his bereaved relatives, and a copy be given to THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL for publication.

ROBERT C. FRANK.

Asheville (N. C.) Typographical Union No. 263 passed the following resolutions:

Whereas, God, in His all-wise Providence, has seen fit to take from our midst, in the prime of life, our fellow craftsman and coworker, Robert C. Frank, who has, from the organization of Typographical Union No. 263 to the day of his death, May 15, 1905, been a loyal and earnest worker for the cause of unionism, ever ready to lend a helping hand to his fellow craftsmen; and

Whereas, This union loses in his death one of its oldest members, a charter member, one who has been honored as its president for several terms, and one who was always ready and willing to do anything in his power for the betterment of the union he loved and the one he has never drawn a traveling card from, nor has his name been off the roll book until it was transferred to the great Roll Book of Eternity; therefore, be it

Resolved, That while our sorrow as fellow members and associates is deep, yet it is not as keen as the bereavement of those of his home, the wife, a son, brothers and sisters; therefore, be it

Resolved, That this union extend to the bereaved ones our sincerest sympathy and condolence in this their hour of trouble; that a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the family; that they be printed in THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL, and that the charter of this union be draped in mourning for thirty days in memory of our departed craftsman.

THE workingman who fights against organized labor has an easy time compared with the capitalist who fights against organized capital. The labor "scab" is no more detestable to his brother laborers than is the capitalist "scab" to his brother capitalists. The most heinous crime an employer of labor can commit is to "scab" on his fellow employers of labor. Just as the individual laborers have organized into groups to protect themselves from the perils of the "scab" employer, the employers federations, associations or trusts are nothing more than unions. They are organized to destroy "scabbing" among themselves and to encourage "scabbing" among others. The banded capitalists discriminate against a "scab" capitalist by refusing him trade advantages and by combining against him in a most relentless fashion. The banded laborers are no more merciless than the banded capitalists.—Jack London, in the Atlantic Monthly.

THE Medical World says: "Labor organizations have worked unremittingly, and are still working for better factory conditions, shorter hours, against child labor, etc. All these things are for the uplifting of humanity, and labor organizations have worked for them in the open. The silent, secret scheming is done by the other side."

Official Budget

THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL

ISSUED ON THE FIFTH OF EACH MONTH.

AT ROOMS 640-650 NEWTON CLAYPOOL BUILDING, INDIANAPOLIS, IND.

J. W. BRAMWOOD, Editor and Publisher

Entered at the postoffice, Indianapolis, Ind., as second-class matter.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.—One dollar per annum to any part of the United States or Canada; foreign, $1.50 per annum; single copies, 10 cents each.

To insure prompt insertion, all official matter, communications and advertisements should reach this office BEFORE THE TWENTIETH OF THE MONTH PRECEDING PUBLICATION.

Advertising rates made known on application. All letters and remittances should be addressed to the editor and publisher.

NOTICE TO SECRETARIES.

Items for the official columns of THE JOURNAL should be prepared on a separate sheet, and the style of the paper followed as closely as possible. Such items should not be made a part of a letter dealing with other subjects, for if this is done the items are likely to be overlooked, even though the greatest care be exercised. Write as plainly as possible—especially proper names—using one side of the sheet only. Communications must in all instances be accompanied by the author's name and address. All official matter must be in the hands of the editor BEFORE THE TWENTIETH OF EACH MONTH, to insure insertion in the issue immediately following. The observance of the foregoing will tend to insure what is desired by all—promptness and accuracy in the publication of official matter.

THE JOURNAL MAILING LIST.

When a member requests a change in his JOURNAL address, he should give the name and number of the union with which he is affiliated, together with his present and former address.

Additions to the mailing list can only be made when received through the local secretary. Members not receiving the magazine should furnish the local secretary with their addresses.

Additions, corrections or alterations reported by local secretaries should be kept separate from other correspondence. When a member deposits his card, and his name is reported for the subscription list, the secretary should state where the member previously received THE JOURNAL, and give the name and number of the union with which he was affiliated. When a member draws his card, is suspended or expelled, or in any manner ceases to be an active member of the local, the secretary should request that his name be dropped from the mailing list.

A large number of those who take cards and remove to unorganized towns fail to renew their cards. To prevent loss in such instances, it has been decided that members holding cards, and located outside of the jurisdiction of a local union, must either deposit their cards with the nearest union and pay dues each month, or pay International dues in advance, in order to get THE JOURNAL. Where a card-holder pays his dues to the local in advance, a specific report should be made by the secretary upon the case, in order that the name can be placed on the list and the magazine sent to the member for the time for which dues have been paid.

The 25th of each month is the latest date upon which changes for the succeeding issue can be made on our mailing list.

Upon request, secretaries will be furnished with a copy of the list of their members to whom THE JOURNAL is being sent.

All correspondence regarding THE JOURNAL should be addressed to J. W. BRAMWOOD, Newton Claypool building, Indianapolis, Ind.

When a craftsman gives a third of his day to an employer he has done the reasonable thing, and no more should be asked of him. Eight hours for work, eight hours for recreation and eight hours for rest mean health and happiness, better workers and therefore better work. As soon as the adjustment can be made, the men of every trade should have the eight-hour day. It should be given to them, not as an experiment, but as something which is their due, and once granted it should never be taken away.—San Francisco Bulletin.

UNIONS IN ARREARS JUNE 24.

Section 1, article ix, of the constitution, requires that: "International dues for each month shall be collected by subordinate unions and transmitted to the secretary-treasurer of the International Typographical Union before the twentieth of the succeeding month." Under this law the May per capita of all unions was due at headquarters not later than June 20. The following unions were delinquent on June 24, having failed to make their returns.

In this connection attention is directed to section 7, article vi, of the by-laws, which is as follows:

"Sec. 7. No funeral-benefit claim shall be allowed unless the deceased was possessed of a current working card at the time of his death, nor shall a funeral-benefit claim be allowed if, at the time of death, the union of which deceased was a member is in arrears for per capita tax to the International Union."

International Stereotypers' and Electrotypers' Union

PRESIDENT'S NOTES.

The president, at the request of Binghamton (N. Y.) Stereotypers' and Electrotypers' Union No. 20, recently visited that city and negotiated an agreement and scale of wages for electrotypers and stereotypers. The new agreement went into effect at once in the Press, Herald, Republican, Leader and Herald Company offices. The scale is as follows:

ELECTROTYPERS.

Molders and finishers, not less than $3.50 per day.

Builders and backers up, first year, $15 per week.

Builders and backers up, second year, $16 per week.

Builders and backers up, third year, $17 per week.

Builders and backers up, fourth year, $17.50 per week.

Builders and backers up, fifth year, $18 per week.

Eight and one-half hours shall constitute a day's work from May —, to January 1, 1906.

From and after January 1, 1906, eight hours shall constitute a day's work.

Seven hours shall constitute a night's work.

Six days or nights shall be a week's work.

Overtime shall be paid for at the rate of time and one-half.

Work on Sundays and legal holidays shall be paid for at double time rates.

Day work shall be work done between 7:30 A. M. and 5:30 P. M.

Night work shall be work done between 6 P. M. and 6 A. M.

Each electrotype establishment shall be entitled to one apprentice.

Any electrotype establishment employing two or more journeymen in the molding room and two journeymen in the finishing room shall be entitled to one molder apprentice and one finisher apprentice.

The scale of wages for electrotypers' apprentices shall be as follows:

First year, not less than $1 per day or night.

Second year, not less than $1.25 per day or night.

Third year, not less than $1.75 per day or night.

Fourth and fifth years, not less than $2 per day or night.

STEREOTYPERS.

First year, not less than $16.50 per week.

Second year, not less than $17 per week.

Third, fourth and fifth years, not less than $18 per week.

Not over eight hours shall constitute a day's work.

Not over seven hours shall constitute a night's work.

Day work shall be work done between 7 A. M. and 6 P. M.

Night work shall be work done between 5 P. M. and 4 A. M.

Work on evening newspapers on Sundays and Labor day shall be price and one-half.

Six days or nights shall constitute a week's work.

Overtime shall be paid for at the rate of time and one-half.

Each establishment employing one or more journeyman stereotypers shall be entitled to one apprentice.

The scale of wages for stereotypers' apprentices shall be as follows:

First year, not less than $1 per day or night.

Second year, not less than $1.25 per day or night.

Third year, not less than $1.75 per day or night.

Fourth and fifth year, not less than $2 per day or night.

JAMES J. FREEL.

VIEWS OF A COUNTRY PRINTER.

Sometimes our surroundings give color to thoughts and to what we write. Being a union printer living in a country town causes me to ask the question why the city unions have not exerted themselves and spent some cash on unionizing every country printing office possible.

The four to six towns nearest to me should be organized into a union, using the most central place in the group for a meeting place. The army of the opposition is recruited from these untrained sources in the country town districts. Much good to the January, 1906, move could be accomplished in the next few months by some thorough and hurried work in the outlying districts all over America.

My membership is with the Atlanta Union No. 48. I learned the printing trade when a boy and left it for twenty-five years, and would not even go into a printing office, knowing of the danger of falling back again into the work.

If printers would breathe more pure outdoor air and less tobacco smoke, the Home would not be filled with so many young men dead and labeled "tuberculosis." Just the simple habit of practicing deep breathing for three minutes a day will save every young printer from this dread disease.

The night of drunkenness, carelessness, counting crossties and general depravity is far spent, and printers everywhere should awake and walk forth clad in the habiliments of their hard-earned dollars in their pockets and in bank, and expressed in good clothes and a genteel appearance, and if a printer is just forever joined to his idols of depravity and going about a pauper, he should never be given a job. The standard has been allowed to run too low, to the ruin of many bright men and good printers. When you raise the standard and require a printer to at least have a one-dollar bill attached to his card, with dues paid to date, it will be a step forward, and these matters should be brought to the attention of every young union printer. Save your money.

There is another peculiar trait of a "traveling," bankrupt printer who hits a country town. He talks and talks of a scale of wages from $15 to $18 a week, and this causes the boys way out in the country towns to whom they appeal for aid to ask why they don't hold these jobs about which they are always talking.

No, brother typos; let's raise the standard; stop joking about serious things, and for heaven's sake quit filling your lungs with smoke from coffin-tack cigarettes and dying early with tuberculosis. Let me repeat: Breathe air, and not smoke, into your lungs; reach out after the higher things of life, and learn the great lesson about the cash you work for, be it $5 or $18 a week—save it! A printer needs cash just like other successful people, and the only way most people get money is to work for it—and then do you save it!

If any reader of these lines can send a fourteen or fifteen-year-old orphan printer boy down this way, he can get a good home and all else that will be coming to him. L. F. Scott.

If a printer employs a carpenter to build or repair his house, he will get only an eight-hour day for the wages he pays. This runs through all the industries in this city with which the individual citizen usually has dealings. Prices and business generally have become, or are becoming adjusted to this situation. The public generally has become converted to the principle of paying wages which will support a family in reasonable comfort, and of being satisfied with hours which give the employe some free time which he can spend wisely if he will.—San Francisco Chronicle.

The Man Behind the Button

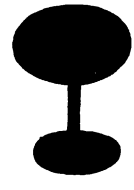
Is a missionary for the good of his organization. Every one who sees the little emblem on the lapel of your coat is made to think. And the first thing he thinks is probably this: "Here is a man who is proud of the fact that he belongs to the printers' union." If every member of the I. T. U. would wear a button, don't you know it would be a great influence for good? You say you never wear a button of any kind?

Why Not Start Now?

And wear the button that represents more to you than any other button could? The I. T. U. Button stands for everything that the label represents, and it can be made almost as great an influence for good. It's of a neat design and is finished in heavy rolled gold. No handsomer button is made—and it costs but 50 cents. If you won't wear a button, then why not send for a pair of the

I.T.U. Link Cuff Buttons?

They are exact reproductions of the button and are finished in the same material—AND THEY ARE HARD TO BREAK. $1 will get them for you. But perhaps you have plenty of cuff buttons, or maybe you don't wear cuffs. Then you had better send for one of the



I.T.U. Stick Pins

These are made in a uniform manner with the lapel buttons and the links. They make attractive scarf pins and are especially suitable for our lady members. 50 cents each.

The Monotype

THE needs, the requirements, even the idiosyncrasies of the average operator have been as carefully considered as the interests of his employer by those who designed The Monotype.

¶ When an operator has once learned how to run either keyboard or caster he has no need to bother himself with countless queries as to what he must do in case this, that or the other thing happens.

¶ Every moment, therefore, of his working day can be turned to his own individual profit and advantage.

¶ At the end of a working year this amounts to the equivalent of no inconsiderable sum.

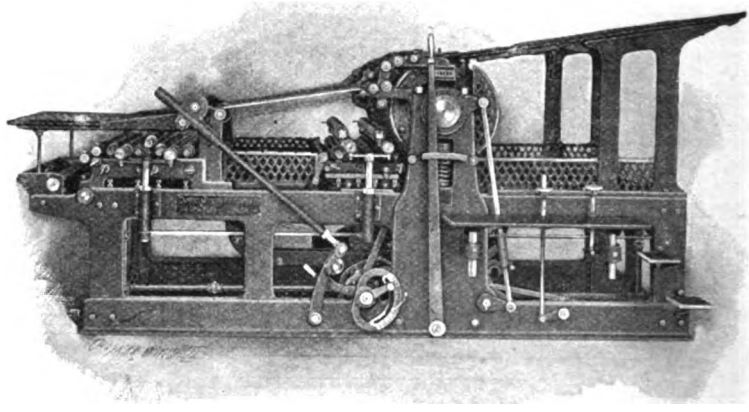
The Century



To the Man who Pays the Piper

Have you any greater waste than the time your presses are stopped for "making ready"? Most make ready is due to a weak impression or to uneven bed or cylinder. If your presses are not absolutely accurate and inflexibly rigid of impression, day after day you will be wasting "make ready" money, and will never know that it is a weak press that is bleeding your payroll to death. There is a scientifically accurate and inflexible press.

If your presses each had been able to turn off a thousand additional impressions per day, how many times during the past year could you have named lower figures upon jobs that your estimate didn't catch? There is a press that will do a thousand more a day than any other machine.

The Typographical Journal

J. W. BRAMWOOD, EDITOR AND PUBLISHER, INDIANAPOLIS, INDIANA
ENTERED AT THE POSTOFFICE, INDIANAPOLIS, INDIANA, AS SECOND CLASS MATTER
ISSUED ON THE FIFTH OF EACH MONTH

VOLUME XXVII — August, 1905 — NUMBER TWO

A GLIMPSE AT THE OFFICERS' REPORTS.

THE reports of the officers of the International Typographical Union to the fifty-first session at Toronto are contained in a pamphlet just mailed to the delegates-elect. The document comprises 129 pages the size and style of THE JOURNAL, and abounds with a fund of information that should be absorbed by every member who wishes to be posted on the affairs of the organization. The president's report comes first in order in the book, and it is followed by reports from the several vice-presidents. Then about twenty-five pages are taken up with the report of the International secretary-treasurer. The rest of the space is given to reports of the organizers, federation delegates and various committees.

There is a distinct note of enthusiasm for the eight-hour movement running through the report of every one of the officers, that is the feature of this year's book. Remarkable progress is shown in the application of businesslike methods to the conduct of the affairs of the organization. There is not one discordant note in the book—even the St. Louis incident has been turned to good.

President Lynch opens his report by discussing the eight-hour campaign. His introductory paragraph is significant of the tone of his whole report. It follows:

> There is but one subject before the International Typographical Union—the establishment of the principle of not more than eight hours for all members of the organization. All other problems, all other questions, all other propositions are incident to the great economic advancement that we are attempting, and which has met with success in many instances.

The list of unions having the eight-hour day and those that have arranged for it is incorporated in the same form as in the monthly bulletins that are sent out from headquarters.

President Lynch briefly summarizes the International Typographical Union eight-hour movement from its inception, traces it through the St. Louis convention and the referendum, and reiterates his familiar slogan—Organize! The fact that the United Typothetæ of America has persistently neglected to confer toward an amicable adjustment of the question at issue is brought out.

The six-city conference and the Detroit conference are noted, and then the St. Louis incident is taken up and the official correspondence and telegrams are given. As an exhibit in connection with the president's report, copies of the telegrams and letters sent to St. Louis by various local unions in protest against its action are presented.

An outline of the Philadelphia situation is given, in which the position of the executive council in its determination to abide by the International laws is clearly set forth.

Under the head "Arbitration" the president says in part:

> As indicated in another portion of this report, our relations with the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, and especially those newspapers having arbitration contracts, have been pleasant and profitable during the past year. We have had several scales arbitrated, and numerous minor matters have been adjusted between the commissioner of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association and the president of the International Typographical Union. As a matter of fact, to my mind the chief value of the arbitration arrangement is the opportunity it affords for the settlement of these minor contentions which formerly caused infinite trouble, often leading to costly and useless strikes.

In connection with the subject of arbitration a list of newspapers holding arbitration agreements is published. The Kansas City mailers' case is discussed at length, and a review of the national board of arbitration awards is given.

The liberty of the press, as involved in a proposed boycott on a union paper for its published opinions, is discussed by President Lynch, and such action is condemned by him.

The practice of "interchanging, exchanging, borrowing, lending or buying of matter previously used, either in the form of type or matrices, between newspapers or job offices not owned by the same individual, firm or corporation, and published in the same establishment," is taken up. The president says:

Section 135 of our general laws "relegates the use of plates and plate supplement matter" to subordinate unions, with power to act. Section 136 applies to the "practice of interchanging, exchanging, borrowing, lending or buying of matter previously used, either in the form of type or matrices, between newspapers or job offices, not owned by the same individual, firm or corporation, and published in the same establishment," and makes such practice unlawful, but it is provided that the reproduction of such type or matrices shall be deemed a compliance with the law. While it may be held that the principle enunciated should be generally applied, it must be admitted that the law itself covers, mainly, local conditions. The comic supplement and colored supplement, replete with both illustrations and text, and supplied from the larger cities in matrix or printed form, are being more generally used. Recently, the information was given your president that one well-known newspaper has some three hundred customers for its comic and colored or feature supplements. Under the law of several local unions, it is required that the typed portion of these supplements shall be reset; still other, and the greater number, of our local unions are silent on the subject; the type is not reset and the use of the supplements is permitted, free from union penalty. As has been pointed out, the condition has changed from a local to a general one, and there should be some pronouncement of policy by the convention. It may be maintained that the use of the supplements should be prohibited, or at least penalized to such an extent as to make their appearance as a part of a daily or Sunday newspaper unprofitable, unless they are produced in the office of the publication with which they appear. Before reaching this conclusion the membership should carefully study the problem. It is admitted that the use of "boiler plate" did not injure, but on the contrary most emphatically helped our trade. Because of this plate hundreds of papers, with the addition of local and telegraph news, type set in the office of publication, not only were enabled to enter unexploited fields, but prospered, incidentally giving employment to hundreds of compositors. Is it not reasonable, then, to assume that the unrestricted use of the comic and feature supplements will permit weak and struggling newspapers to continue in the field and gradually gain strength and standing? The more newspapers, the more opportunity for employment for our members, and we should pause and consider well before taking any action that will harass or throttle publications that might otherwise be a source of livelihood for an important proportion of our membership. It may be that the supplements will curtail opportunity for employment in isolated instances, but it is the general good that should be considered.

The splendid fight being waged on the Los Angeles Times is discussed and recommendation is made that the fight be continued in the same vigorous way.

President Lynch discusses the scale statistics compiled by Secretary Bramwood, and reproduces several of the most important tables. As this matter has been covered by the secretary-treasurer in THE JOURNAL, and as the reports are accessible to every member of the organization, comment here is unnecessary.

Under the head "Organization," the International president quotes a letter to organizers, and shows that we are gaining strength under fire. From this part of his report the following is quoted:

It is a fact that, despite the increased International per capita tax, the eight-hour assessment, supplemented in many instances by local assessments, and the feeling of uneasiness natural to a campaign for shorter hours, we have not only retained our membership, but have made a gain, small though it is. There is now under way an organizing effort initiated by local unions acting on suggestions from headquarters, and the fruits of this work do not appear in the membership total for 1904-1905. It took time to get this great movement started, and we know from the reports received that it is more than justifying itself in the results thus far apparent.

Under the head "Some Office Work" is the following:

During the year just ended there were issued from the president's department 23,010 official, typewritten letters. The following eight-hour circulars were distributed throughout the jurisdiction: 10,000 No. 8, 10,000 No. 9, 35,000 No. 10, 20,000 No. 11, 3,000 No. 12, and 18,000 circulars under the following titles, "Golden Nuggets," "Boost," "Organize." Attached to the latter were blanks showing the plan used by Chicago Typographical Union to obtain the names and addresses of non-union printers in the jurisdiction of No. 16 and adjacent territory. The plan referred to has been adopted by many locals. Total number of circulars distributed, 96,000; making 23,375 packages. One thousand nine hundred and sixty-seven boxes of buttons, containing from 15 to 1,000 buttons, a total of 50,000, were mailed to secretaries and presidents of locals, eight-hour committeemen and chairmen of chapels. Ten thousand eight-hour buttons, of special design, were furnished our Canadian unions.

Every effort has been made to answer all correspondence promptly and furnish information requested. Here I desire to repeat the statement made in my report to the St. Louis convention, i. e., that in many cases members of local unions present to the International officers for advice local situations and questions that should first be passed upon by local unions. In all such instances correspondents are directed to bring these matters before their unions, and if then dissatisfied the privilege of appeal is suggested. The International president will not interfere with the rights and prerogatives of local unions. Correspondents must bear this in mind.

Several court decisions are dealt with that have affected our interests; label propaganda touched on; the Union Printers' Home is given attention; our agreement with affiliated unions is discussed, and several other matters covered. The president's report ends with the following:

TO THE COLORS.

This is the eight-hour convention. Let eight hours be its rallying cry.

FIRST VICE-PRESIDENT.

First Vice-President John W. Hays reports a very successful year's work. He spent some time at Madison, Wis., helping to push the bill for a state printing plant. This bill seemed to have good chances of success, but after much time had been spent in working to get it through, it was pointed out by the attorney-general of the state that such a law would be unconstitutional and the matter was dropped. Vice-President Hays represented President Lynch on the national arbitration board at Kansas City and Zanesville, Ohio. Visits were made to a number of cities in Wisconson, Minnesota, Missouri, Ohio, Illinois, Virginia and West Virginia. Trouble over the enforcement of a scale at Winnipeg, Man., required the services of the vice-president for some time. In each instance where the vice-president was called on to adjust trouble, a satisfactory settlement was arrived at. Mr. Hays closes his report with the hope for a successful convention and the inauguration of the eight-hour day.

SECOND VICE-PRESIDENT.

Secretary Miller, for the Typographia, reports his organization as being in the best of shape, the only German printing office of any consequence in the country that is out of the German Union being the Philadelphia Demokrat. The amount in the general treasury has been increased from $22,790 to $25,095, or a little over $25 per capita. Secretary Miller discusses the injustice which he says was put upon the German members by the St. Louis convention in passing an amendment to the old law governing German work, which places the members of the Typographia in the position of working on German composition in English offices for a lower scale than provided by the local Typographia. He announces that an amendment will be submitted to the Toronto convention that will have for its object the abolishment of this injustice.

THIRD VICE-PRESIDENT.

Vice-President Mulcahy, for the mailers, announces that his branch of the trade has made wonderful improvement during the year. Seven new unions have been organized, and increases in scale gained in several instances. A steady, consistent increase in membership is reported.

FOURTH VICE-PRESIDENT.

Vice-President Bracken, of the newspaper writers, reports that matters are moving along in a quiet way. Mr. Bracken says the writers will be found in the front ranks in the eight-hour fight. The gentleman has a suggestion which he offers to the membership that may prove of interest to many. He advocates the purchase of printing machinery and all necessary stock to equip a large office, this material and stock to be put into use wherever our members are on strike or are locked out, in order that the public may not suffer through a cessation of the printing business. This, Mr. Bracken argues, would remove a source of criticism of strikes.

FIFTH VICE-PRESIDENT.

Vice-President Nuernberger, of the typefounders, reports that nothing of importance has transpired in his branch during the past year. He says in part:

It may interest members of the International Typographical Union to know that the cost of manufacturing type has been reduced somewhat, while the price of type has been increased, or the weight of fonts has been reduced, thus increasing the price per pound and giving the employing typefounders a greater profit than ever, and the printer pays the bill.

THE SECRETARY-TREASURER.

By way of introduction, Secretary-Treasurer Bramwood opens his annual report with a table giving the complete record of the receipts and expenditures of the International body for the year just ended. It follows:

RECEIPTS—June 1, 1904, to May 31, 1905.

Under the head "Our Membership," the secretary-treasurer says:

The continued success of the International Typographical Union, and its steady increase in membership, despite the opposition of various employers' associations, citizens' alliances, etc., must be encouraging and gratifying to every member of the organization. Though our progress has not been startling or sensational, an increment in the membership is shown by the following statement, based upon the per capita tax payments for the twelve months ending May 31, 1905:

Typographical—English and German	45,435
Mailers	1,047
Typefounders	98
Newspaper Writers	154
Total	46,734

From the above table it is apparent that the average paying membership for the fiscal year was 46,734, an increase of 569 over the average for the preceding year, and 4,298 greater than for the year 1903.

The following table shows how the increase in membership during the past year compares with former records:

Year.	Members.
1891	*25,165
1892	*28,187
1893	*30,454
1894	*31,379
1895	*29,295
1896	28,838
1897	28,096
1898	28,614
1899	30,646
1900	32,105
1901	34,948
1902	†38,364
1903	42,436
1904	‡46,165
1905	46,734

* Including pressmen and bookbinders.

† Including stereotypers and electrotypers, seven months.

Thus we find the International Union stronger numerically and financially than ever before in its history, notwithstanding that it has relinquished control over pressmen, pressfeeders, bookbinders, bindery girls, photo-engravers and stereotypers and electrotypers during the last fifteen years. The constant additions to the ranks of the organization and its financial gains are indicative of that substantiality which marks all progress.

The list of charters issued and suspended shows that forty-three new unions were formed, thirty-three surrendered their charters and twelve were suspended, but the net gain in membership through the operation was fifty-one.

For the purpose of comparison, a tabulated summary of the receipts and expenditures of the International union since the year 1901 is given. It is as follows:

Year.	Receipts.	Expenditures.
1891	$53,483 50	$57,296 26
1892	113,134 49	112,118 22
1893	127,764 14	120,984 95
1894	119,051 33	108,960 92
1895	92,902 66	89,650 72
1896	95,042 90	93,210 06
1897	110,519 53	135,162 97
1898	113,163 79	111,978 02
1899	128,436 70	*135,762 54
1900	177,484 79	185,033 57
1901	138,631 67	118,347 54
1902	151,141 23	145,760 31
1903	185,183 08	174,085 33
1904	240,005 00	252,817 38
1905	244,689 24	205,822 41
Total	$2,090,634 05	†$2,036,991 22

*Embraces loss in Indianapolis National Bank, $19,955.98.

†Includes sum transferred to treasurer Union Printers' Home, $532,741.28.

The balance in the special defense fund June 1, 1904, was $9,622.95; the fund's portion of the per capita tax to May 31, 1905, was $28,036.82; the donation by Guthrie Union was $11.32; making the total on May 31, 1905, $37,671.09.

The Home fund is reported as follows:

Fund's portion per capita tax to May 31, 1905	$56,081 15
Transportation of inmates returned	154 80
Total	$56,235 95
Transferred to Home Treasurer	$56,235 95

The balance in the general fund on June 1, 1904, was $4,341.18; the receipts to May 31, 1905, were $35,418.74; making a total of $39,759.92. The expenditures were $37,868.88, leaving a balance in the fund on May 31, 1905, of $1,891.04. Some of the expenses borne by the general fund during the current year were out of the usual order, to wit:

Federation assessment	$1,408 74
Removal of headquarters, new office furniture, desks, fixtures, etc.	1,488 70
Addressograph and supplies	285 16
Three new typewriters, desks and copyholders	384 00
Total	$3,566 60

The secretary-treasurer says: "With the exception of the assessment levied by the American Federation of Labor, the foregoing expenses are not likely to be duplicated for several years. Aside from this, the revenue accruing was slightly more than the demand on the general fund. There is no probability of a marked increase in the balance to the credit of the general fund on the present apportionment of per capita tax, but it should be able to bear its proportion of expense."

A slight decrease is noted by the secretary in the number of burial claims. In the twelve months ending May 31, 1904, benefits to the number of 578 were paid, as against 567 for the fiscal year closing May 31, 1905. The receipts of the fund to May 31, 1905, were $42,060.85; the expenditures were $39,690.00; leaving a balance of receipts over expenditures of $2,370.85, which, together with the balance carried over from last year, amounts to $19,927.78. The death rate for the year was 1.213 per cent. of the average membership, or a little more than 12 per 1,000. The average death rate since the establishment of the fund has been 1.219 per cent., about 12 per 1,000. A table giving the age and cause of death, and the number of deaths at certain ages, is appended.

The receipts of the TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL fund for the fiscal year were $31,312.70. The expenditures from the fund were $29,426.77. Including the balance of $170.38 carried over from last year, the total now in the fund is $2,056.31. This does not include $677.84 due from advertisers.

A summary of the receipts and expenditures of the Cummings Memorial fund shows:

Donations, June 1, 1902 to May 31, 1903	$410 21
Donations, June 1, 1903 to May 31, 1904	4,730 28
Donations, June 1, 1904 to May 31, 1905	6,833 53
Interest, June 1, 1904, to May 31, 1905	171 68
Total	$12,145 70
Expenses of committee	832 85
Balance in fund May 31, 1905	$11,312 85

A table showing the amounts contributed by different unions is included in this portion of the secretary-treasurer's report.

The Los Angeles Times fight is referred to, and the secretary-treasurer says in part:

An assessment of 5 cents per member per month was levied by a referendum vote for the benefit of Los Angeles No. 174, in its fight against the notoriously unfair Times, in December, 1902. The collections began with the month of January, and continued up to and including December, 1903. It amounted in all to $26,350.11. Of this sum, $24,185.31 had been transferred to Los Angeles Union up to May 31, 1904, and a balance of $2,164.80 remained in the hands of the secretary-treasurer on that date. During this year the balance named was forwarded to No. 174, and the assessment account closed.

Nineteen strikes, involving sixteen local unions, took place during the fiscal year. A summary is here given of the strike table:

Strikes won	7
Strikes lost	6
Arbitrated	1
Result not reported	1
Strikes pending	4
Total number	19
Number of men who returned to work when settlement was made	111
Number of men displaced	72
Number of men involved in pending disputes	73
Number of men interested in the 19 strikes	256

This statement does not include the disputes in which Chicago and New York electrotypers were engaged.

The expenses of the International Eight-Hour Committee are shown in the following table:

Circulars and cards	$453 50
Buttons and boxes	470 44
Clerical work	565 25
Stamped envelopes	560 95
Postage stamps	165 00
Traveling expenses of committee	186 09
Secret work	138 14
Total	$2,539 37

The remainder of the secretary-treasurer's report is taken up with the tabulated statements under the headings "Receipts from and Benefits Drawn by Local Unions" and "Membership of Subordinate Unions." These reports occupy over fourteen pages, and form a decidedly interesting feature.

A summary of the daily record of the mail and express matter sent out by the secretary-treasurer during the year shows:

MAIL.

Typewritten letters	23,409
Postal cards	11,830
Papers (exclusive of those mailed by printer)	12,638
Organizing literature, packages	443
Supplies, packages	3,916
Miscellaneous (receipts, circulars, etc.)	19,646

EXPRESS.

Organizing literature, packages	106
Supplies, packages	1,140
Total	73,135

The foregoing shows an increase of 2,332 in the number of typewritten letters sent out by the secretary-treasurer during the past year.

The expenses incurred in transacting the general business of the organization during the past fiscal year (exclusive of THE JOURNAL and the eight-hour committee) were:

Officers' salaries	$4,300 00
Office rent, light, insurance, telephones, new furniture, etc	4,578 11
Clerk hire, auditors' services	7,956 90
Stationery for headquarters and vice-presidents	431 13
Miscellaneous printing	865 95
Postage (exclusive of eight-hour circulars)	882 00
Stamped envelopes and postal cards	934 05
Expressage	297 10
Exchange	92 60
Telegrams (prior to November 1, 1904)	370 18
Supplies purchased for resale	2,900 89
Total cost	$23,608 91
Less receipts from supplies, interest and desk-room	6,187 19
Net cost	$17,421 72

Average cost per member, 37 cents.
Cost per member for officers' salaries, 9.2 cents.

In conclusion Secretary-Treasurer Bramwood says:

The Toronto convention will be an important one, as it will deal with questions of vital interest to the future welfare of the organization. There can be no question that the delegates to the fifty-first session will endeavor to solve the problems presented in such manner as will redound to the credit of the International Typographical Union.

I desire to thank the officers and members of subordinate unions for the spirit of co-operation manifested by them during the year.

REPORTS OF THE ORGANIZERS.

Organizer Birdsall reports a steady and gratifying growth in all lines of organized labor in Colorado. The work of organizing is being carried forward in good shape. The organizer says that of the thirteen unions in the state, six have the eight-hour day, and others have arrangements which will see it in effect by the first of January. In closing his report, Organizer Birdsall predicts a magnificent victory on the first day of January, 1906.

The report of Organizer Bonnington deals with the negotiations at Fresno, which resulted satisfactorily, and the agitation of the San Francisco Citizens' Alliance to return to the nine-hour day. The fight on the Los Angeles Times is referred to, and the organizer recommends that the Toronto convention provide for its continuance.

Organizer Brady has been visiting local unions in Indiana, Illinois, Ohio and Kentucky, and has been instrumental in securing many new wage contracts and substantial increases. Visits have been paid to every local in the state of Indiana, and the organizer finds eight-hour sentiment unanimous. The organizer is now located at Louisville, Ky., where a campaign of organization is being carried on that promises to be successful.

Organizer Boyle visited Chilicothe, Mo., Nebraska City, Neb., Kearney, Hastings, Beatrice and Columbus, and was instrumental in encouraging the printers working in these cities. He secured a number of applications for membership, and has things in such shape that several charters will be applied for in a short time.

Organizer Colbert submits an extended report, which deals mainly with his work in the state of Illinois. Much good is reported and many increases in wage contracts were secured through the co-operation of the organizer. On May 2 the organizer started on a special trip through the state of Illinois, and visited every union in the state. He reports that he found our members united on the eight-hour question. The affiliation of the country printer is discussed and urged by the organizer.

Organizer Devereux deals with the trouble that occurred on the Lead (S. D.) Daily Call. The successful outcome of the matter is reported. The organizer was instrumental in securing the eight-hour day for Superior and Ashland, Wis. Several new unions were formed and a number of membership certificates issued.

Organizer Dolan has been working principally in the state of Pennsylvania, where he was able to help settle a number of disputes without serious trouble in the shape of strikes, that weapon being resorted to in but two instances, the unions being victorious in both cases.

Organizer Fennessy reports conditions in southern California as good. He devotes considerable space to a discussion of the affiliating of country printers, along which line he has been highly successful.

Organizer Hayes has been able to put new life into several Ohio unions that were beginning to lag. The organization of the country printer is also urged by Mr. Hayes.

Organizer J. W. Hays devoted most of his time to Minnesota and Wisconsin. The arbitration case of the Courier-Journal and the Times, in the city of Louisville, was handled by the organizer, as a representative of President Lynch on the national board of arbitration. Trouble in a number of places was averted by the co-operation of the organizer.

Organizer Hill speaks hopefully of labor conditions in the south. His work has been in that territory exclusively, and he says the spirit of organization is rife in Dixie. The organizer has had a busy year and has been uniformly successful in the many cases that were referred to him for settlement.

Organizer Hogan has been very successful in securing eight-hour contracts in Idaho and Montana. He reports conditions in his territory as being good.

Organizer Hudspeth says the spirit of organization is spreading among the printers of Mississippi and Louisiana, and the prospects for the successful inauguration of the shorter workday are bright.

Organizer James has visited all the unions between the Niagara and Detroit rivers, with the exception of Woodstock, and finds them in healthy condition. He reports active work by the eight-hour committees of the unions he has visited.

Organizer Leache has been visiting many country towns and has secured a number of applications. The organizer has devised a card scheme for the registering of the non-unionists and it is bringing results.

Organizer McLoughlin reports a busy and successful year. He helped a number of unions to secure an increase in wages, and several to get the eight-hour day.

Organizer Radley reports conditions in Texas, Indian Territory and Oklahoma as encouraging.

Organizer Rust has been successful in his negotiations in Washington and Oregon. The inauguration of the eight-hour day is expected with but little trouble.

Organizer Rodier is working around Montreal, and expects to soon report the application for charter by several small unions.

Organizer Scott has very thoroughly covered New England, and has a satisfactory report to make of conditions in that part of the country. The work of affiliating the country printer is going on in good style.

Organizer Wilson reports the printing trade in the state of Michigan as never more prosperous. The state is well organized.

Organizer Woodrow helped to settle trouble for a number of unions in Pennsylvania, and is working for the organization of the country printer, in preparation for the shorter workday.

REPORT OF FEDERATION DELEGATES.

The delegates to the American Federation of Labor from the International Typographical Union submit a very comprehensive report. The total receipts of the American Federation of Labor for the year ended September 30, 1904, were $220,995.97, and the expenses $203,991.15, leaving a balance of $103,017.94 on hand October 1, 1904. The average paid-up membership was 1,676,200—a gain of 210,400 over the previous year. The indorsement of the eight-hour movement of the International Typographical Union by the American Federation of Labor is given in full. The strong report of President Gompers on the subject, and the resolutions submitted by the committee and unanimously adopted by the convention, are presented.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

The report of the committee on copyright law shows that during the year five bills amending the copyright law were introduced in congress, but only one of these became a law. Conferences between the committee and a committee of American publishers have been productive of much good, and the prediction is made that the committee will be able to accomplish much with the co-operation of these men.

The committee on government ownership and control of the telegraph reports its inability to secure recognition for its measure on account of the pressure of other business before the last session of congress. It requests all organizations to take up the government ownership question and help to push it.

The report of the Cummings' Memorial committee reviews the steps already taken in the gathering of this fund, and urges local unions to do their share in making the movement a success. A most thorough and active canvass is being made, and the committee says the fund promises to be ready for use in a short time.

The label committee on text books has been very successful in gathering statistics on the matter in their care, which will be useful in future work in this line. The answers to the circulars sent out by the committee have been prompt and comprehensive. The committee recommends that the question of the label on school books be taken up by the joint conference board at its next sitting.

THE UNION PRINTERS' HOME.

The board of trustees of the Union Printers' Home reports that the business transacted at its annual meeting was of a routine character. Plans for further beautifying the Home grounds were taken up and endorsed. It was decided to install a duplex pump. Changes were ordered made in the piping to improve the heating facilities. Six additional tents were ordered for the use of tuberculous patients. Several other minor matters were disposed of. The offer of the portrait of William Aimison, from Nashville Union, was accepted, and it was ordered placed in the Jefferson Davis memorial room. Superintendent Deacon was instructed to confer with the fire chief of Colorado Springs relative to more adequate fire protection, and the recommendations of the chief were carried out at a later date. All residents of the Home were examined and testimony taken in regard to food provided, the service, etc.

Secretary-Treasurer Bramwood in his report gives the total receipts for the year as $69,202.62, and the expenditures as $60,732.69, which left a balance of $8,469.93 in the fund. The cost of improvements during the fiscal year was $6,157.50, and an additional $1,000 was expended in purchasing another cemetery plot.

A summary of the receipts and expenditures on account of the Home, from its inception to May 31, 1905, is given as follows:

RECEIPTS.

Contribution of Messrs. Childs and Drexel..	$10,000 00
Contributions and interest from June, 1886, to October 31, 1890	16,933 63
Contributions, assessments and interest from November 1, 1890, to April 30, 1892	52,889 37
Per capita tax and assessments from May 1, 1892, to June 30, 1898	144,893 87
Hospital annex assessment to June 30, 1898..	14,612 95
Julia A. Ladd bequest	1,045 00
Per capita tax and all receipts of fund from July 1, 1898, to May 31, 1905	330,304 20
Total	$570,080 02

EXPENDITURES.

Building and furnishing main building.	$70,114 44
Building and furnishing hospital annex	22,062 54
Building and furnishing superintendent's cottage.	3,400 00
Building laundry, machinery for same, etc..	12,241 55
Maintenance, salaries, repairs, improvements, etc., from opening of Home to May 31, 1905	453,771 56
Total	$561,610 09
Balance in fund May 31, 1905	8,469 93
Total	$570,080 02

The total cost per inmate of conducting the Home during the past year was $453.22.

In concluding his report the secretary-treasurer says:

> Aside from the building expenditures ($8,192.32) the cost of maintaining the Home was less than its revenue by $4,564.75. With the amount expended on the buildings, the expenses of the institution exceeded the revenue by $3,627.57. These figures clearly indicate that the present resources of the Home are barely more than adequate for the demands made upon them. While the number of inmates does not materially increase, and no extensive building operations are undertaken, additional revenue will not be needed. Another increase in per capita tax will be necessary with any marked increase in the demands on the Home fund.

In his report the superintendent of the Home gives a statement of the expenditures by months, showing a total of $58,862.65, divided as follows:

Groceries	$9,666 88	Transportation (Inmates)	$1,137 25
Meats	7,263 41	Transportation (Supt.)	62 65
Clothing	2,457 02	Salaries	13,624 50
Drugs	912 97	Telephone and telegraph	180 86
Heating and lighting	2,964 87	Laundry	280 58
Hay and grain	1,668 66	Water	488 36
Furnishing	3,280 85	Postage	33 00
Building	8,222 83	Dentistry	29 00
Wines and liquors	133 75	Spectacles and repairs	45 35
Books and stationery	371 58	Tobacco	64 25
Ice	235 67	Insurance	89 25
Pensions	3,202 00	Sundries	576 63
Burial	1,567 00
Farm and garden	303 48	Total	$58,862 65

The average number of inmates for the year was 134. The furnishing account for the year was $3,280.85. The building account was $8,222.83. The burial account was $1,567.00. The transportation account was $1,137.25. The maintenance account was $40,668.38.

The pension account for the twelve months amounted to $3,202, as against $2,882; an increase of $320 over the preceding year.

The total number of meals served during the year was 178,203, at a cost for table supplies of $16,450.14. The net cost per meal per inmate was 9 cents.

The library of the home is rapidly growing.

Nineteen deaths occurred during the last year, fifteen of which were of tuberculosis. The tents which were erected for the use of this class of patients have proved a great benefit, and have helped in combating the dread disease.

The number of inmates in the Home on June 1, 1905, was 134.

In concluding the superintendent says the conduct of the Home residents was up to the usual high standard.

INQUIRY RELATIVE TO THE ALLEGED PASSAGE OF AN ANTI-EIGHT-HOUR RESOLUTION RESULTS IN EXPRESSIONS ON OTHER SUBJECTS.

SOME weeks ago the attention of the editor of THE JOURNAL was called to a circular that was being sent out by a state typothetæ in which a resolution against the eight-hour movement of the International Typographical Union was quoted as having been passed at the recent meeting of the National Manufacturers' Association at Atlanta, Ga. While the alleged resolution carried little weight, simply pledging the two hundred members present, as individuals, to oppose the movement, yet the assertion that any such matter had come before the meeting was a bit of news that could hardly be accounted for. Two members of the International Typographical Union, acting under orders from headquarters, were present at the sessions of the convention, and they firmly assert that no such resolution came before the meeting. Newspaper reporters who covered the meetings for the Atlanta papers deny any knowledge of the resolution. No mention of it was made in the press dispatches sent out in regard to the convention—and if it was really adopted, it seemed to THE JOURNAL that it would be "played up" by the daily press, particularly as the National Editorial Association is supposed to be on record with similar action. In order to get more light on the matter the editor of THE JOURNAL took the subject up with D. M. Parry, president of the association. Mr. Parry maintained that such a resolution was passed, and referred our inquiry to F. C. Nunemacher, of Louisville, an officer of the National Manufacturers' Association, one of the executive committee of the United Typothetæ of America, and reputed to be one of the vice-presidents of the Citizens' Industrial Alliance. The following correspondence is self-explanatory:

FIRST LETTER.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., June 29, 1905.

D. M. Parry, President National Association of Manufacturers, City:

DEAR SIR—In a circular, recently issued by the typothetæ of New Haven, Conn., the statement is made that the following resolution was unanimously adopted by your association at its recent meeting at Atlanta:

Whereas, The International Typographical Union has indicated that its members will, on January 1, 1906, demand of their employers throughout the country the establishment of an eight-hour workday (instead of nine hours as now) without proportionate adjustment of wages paid, coupled with the statement that where demands are refused work will cease immediately in the establishment so refusing, and such concerted action being, in the minds of this convention, in a measure a conspiracy to force the employing printers to accede to the demands made and contrary to the principles of equity and fair dealing; therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, as individuals and consumers of printing, do hereby pledge to the employing printers of America our hearty co-operation and support during the crisis in their business, caused by this demand.

The press reports of your meeting made no mention of this resolution. One of your members has also informed me that he does not recall the resolution having been before the convention. If not inconsistent with the policy of your association, I would be glad to have you advise me whether or not the resolution in question was adopted.

Thanking you in advance for authoritative information on this point, I am

Very truly yours,

J. W. BRAMWOOD.

REPLY.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., July 5, 1905.

Mr. J. W. Bramwood, Secretary and Treasurer International Typographical Union, Newton Claypool Building, City:

DEAR SIR—I have yours of June 29, and according to the records of our association, the resolution which you refer to was unanimously adopted at the annual convention of the National Association of Manufacturers held at Atlanta May 16–18. The resolution was sent out by the Associated Press, and I think you must be laboring under a mistake when you say that no mention of the same was made in the press of the country.

In order that you may have a fuller idea of the resolution, I am referring your letter to Mr. Frank C. Nunemacher, of the Nunemacher Press, Louisville, Ky., with the request that Mr. Nunemacher write you if he thinks advisable. Mr. Nunemacher is a member of the executive committee of the National Association of Manufacturers, and is fully qualified to speak in the first person as to the weight of this resolution.

Very truly yours,

D. M. PARRY,
President.

ANOTHER LETTER.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., July 6, 1905.

D. M. Parry, President National Association of Manufacturers, City:

DEAR SIR—Your favor of July 5 is before me. In response, I have to thank you for the information contained in your letter. Since writing you, one of our representatives has interviewed the newspaper reporters of Atlanta who represented their respective papers at the recent meeting of your organization. All these reporters state that the resolution, quoted in my previous letter to you, did not come before the convention, and was not passed, unless action upon it was taken in secret session or by your executive committee. The Atlanta Journal, which made a special effort to give a complete report of your convention, made no mention of the resolution in question. The employing printers of the southeast held a meeting in Atlanta a day or two after your convention closed. Nothing was said at their meeting regarding the resolution presumably adopted by your convention.

Our exchange list comprises a large number of the prominent daily papers throughout the entire country. The press dispatches in these papers did not report the adoption of the resolution, which you say was passed unanimously by your convention. I would be pleased to have you give me the names of any of the daily papers which reported the resolution. This request and the foregoing statements are not made with the intention of contradicting your statements, but with a view to confirming them. This office has had numerous inquiries in regard to this resolution, and it is my desire to answer them intelligently.

Very truly yours,

J. W. BRAMWOOD.

REPLY TO SECOND LETTER.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., July 8, 1905.

Mr. J. W. Bramwood, Secretary International Typographical Union, City:

DEAR SIR—I have yours of July 6. Mr. F. C. Nunemacher, of the Nunemacher Press, Louisville, Ky., sends me a copy of his letter to you under date of July 6, and it would seem that he has fully answered you. However, upon inquiry, I find that the resolution referred to was carried by the Associated Press in full on the day that it was adopted by the convention, and that it was printed in several papers over the country. If the resolution did not appear in some papers, that should not be considered strange, in consideration of the fact that a great many newspaper publishers are under the coercive fear of the typographical union and will ofttimes decline to print news which might seem to antagonize it.

I hope that you will not have the impression that the National Association of Manufacturers is engaged in any secret or underhanded work such as you suggest in connection with the resolution. The executive committee of the association did not touch upon the typographical matter in any manner whatsoever. The members of the National Association of Manufacturers are self-respecting men, and I am quite sure that none of them would countenance an attempt to foist upon the country a secret resolution as having come from the convention. In any event such action would not have been necessary in this particular case, since the demand of the typographical union that the typothetæ pay nine hours' wages for eight hours' work does not appeal to good business judgment and a sense of fair play. It is well understood that this increase in wages must be collected from the rest of the people for the particular benefit of the members of the typographical union. If an individual should make such a demand in any line of human effort, it would be considered a hold-up pure and simple. That the demand should be made in the name of organized labor does not change the moral aspect of the proposition. The demand is nothing more or less than an effort to pilfer an unjust toll from the pockets of the consumer, and, since no man likes to have his pockets picked, whether by a labor trust or capitalistic trust, it is only natural that the typothetæ should have the support of every man in this country who believes in fair play. The International Typographical Union trust, when it attempts to hold up the consuming public, is not a whit better than any other trust.

The employing printers have asked you what compensation they shall receive for having their expensive machinery tied up an extra hour. What do you offer them in return for this loss?

I can not believe that the public will be enthusiastic in the support of your organization in this particular demand. I think that I can positively say that the three thousand factories which compose the membership of the National Association of Manufacturers will not evidence much zeal in assisting you to enforce the demands of the typographical union trust upon the consuming public.

Very truly yours,

D. M. PARRY,
President.

AND STILL ANOTHER LETTER.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., July 14, 1905.

D. M. Parry, President National Association of Manufacturers, Indianapolis, Ind.:

DEAR SIR—In reply to your letter of July 8, permit me to say that my object in writing you was to ascertain whether the resolution in question had been passed by the association over which you preside. In your reply to my first letter, you stated that the action on the resolution had been "sent out by the Associated Press," etc. In my reply dated July 6, your attention was called to the assertion of the Atlanta reporters that the resolution did not come before the convention, and that the Atlanta Journal, which made special efforts to present a complete report, failed to mention the resolution in question. In addition, I have the word of two gentlemen who attended every session of your convention, to the effect that the resolution was not passed, unless such action was taken by your executive committee. In my reply of June 6, you were asked to give me the name of one paper which reported the passage of the resolution in question, but you fail to respond to this request. A copy of the proceedings containing the resolution has been furnished me, but you will excuse me for saying that its presence there is not absolute proof of its passage by the convention.

As the matter stands, there is grave doubt in my mind relative to the passage of the resolution in question by your association. The silence of the press on the subject is especially noticeable. Your assertion that the reason for this is "that a great many newspaper publishers are under the coercive fear of the typographical union and will ofttimes decline to print news which might seem to antagonize it" is ridiculous, but I nevertheless hope you will give your views on that point to the press of the country.

Your opinion was not asked on the merits or demerits of the position of the International Typographical Union on the eight-hour question, nor did our organization request you or the manufacturers' association to endorse its attitude. I do not believe there is a member of the International Typographical Union who cares one iota for D. M. Parry's views on this or any other question. Most of them would prefer Mr. Parry's opposition to his support. It is well known that you are opposed to every effort of labor to improve its condition. You favor long hours and low wages, and oppose all effort at improvement. You believe in child labor and oppose state laws restricting its use. In fact, you are bitterly opposed to all progression of the laboring class, and continue to preach a doctrine based upon deception, hatred and oppression.

You go out of your way to insult the typographical union in your letter of July 8, and in so doing, again—as always—display your ignorance and bias. You call it the "International Typographical Union trust" and say that our demand for an eight-hour day "is nothing more or less than an effort to pilfer an unjust toll," etc. If your assertions are true, and you are so opposed to trusts, why did you not favor the passage of the anti-trust bill by the last Indiana legislature, and thus curb the acts of such unlawful combinations? But instead of that, you urged the defeat of the anti-trust law, on the pretended ground that it would tend to drive capital from the state, but for the real reason that you were afraid that the enforcement of such a law might prohibit certain "trade regulations" which now exist among manufacturers.

I realize that it is a waste of time to discuss economics or trade unionism with one who has so often displayed his illiteracy on these subjects. All progress of the masses of the people has been made despite the opposition of such as you, and so it will continue to the end. I have lived to see the hours of labor in many industries reduced from twelve and fourteen to nine and eight, and realize that it is only a question of time until the wage workers will enjoy a universal eight-hour day. The employment of child and woman labor has also been greatly restricted during the past forty-five years, and further legislation on these points will follow. And all this has been accomplished, and will be accomplished, over the puerile protest of such as you, who persist in preaching the doctrine of the dark ages.

As usual, you make statements on subjects with which you are unfamiliar, in your letter of July 8. It may surprise you—if anything will—to learn that at least 20,000 of the members of the International Typographical Union have enjoyed an eight-hour day, or less, for a number of years. It may also surprise you to learn that at the present time 32,000, or two-thirds of our members, are working eight hours per day, or less. Again, as you interject the wage question, it may be interesting to hear that in every instance thus far the members of the typothetæ have offered to increase wages if the eight-hour day was abandoned, and in some instances the increase in wages closely approximated what would be gained by the union, on a monetary basis, by concession of the eight-hour day. So you see it is not so much a question of wages with the typothetæ as you appear to think. Again, it may surprise you to learn that at least fifty per cent of our book and job members are engaged in offices outside of the typothetæ—in other words, the typothetæ only speaks for a portion of the book and job employers. You can readily verify this by making inquiry in Indianapolis. In this city the typothetæ offices only employ about one-third of our book and job members.

The fear "that the three thousand factories which compose the membership of the National Association of Manufacturers will not evidence much zeal in assisting you to enforce the demands of the typographical union trust upon the consuming public" will not in the least deter the International Typographical Union from its efforts to enforce the eight-hour day. According to the census reports, the membership of your association comprises but an infinitesimal part of the manufacturing establishments of the United States. Moreover, the majority of your members have too much common sense to be guided by the spirit of the resolution in question. Very truly yours,

J. W. BRAMWOOD.

LETTER FROM F. C. NUNEMACHER.

LOUISVILLE, KY., July 6, 1905.

Mr. J. W. Bramwood, Secretary and Treasurer International Typographical Union, Newton Claypool Building, Indianapolis, Ind.:

MY DEAR MR. BRAMWOOD—Mr. D. M. Parry, president of the National Association of Manufacturers, has referred to me your letter of June 29th, making inquiry as to whether or not the convention passed the resolution in which the association pledged to the employing printers of America the co-operation and support of its members during the crisis in their business caused by the demand for an eight-hour workday on the part of the International Typographical Union, and would say that this resolution was passed unanimously by the convention, of which fact I can bear testimony, as I was secretary of the resolution committee, and as such had the resolution typewritten after it had been passed by the committee, and handed it personally to the secretary of the convention and heard it read and voted upon.

As to your statement that the press reports of the convention made no mention of the resolution, would say that you are correct in this to a certain extent, for although I understand it was delivered with other resolutions to the representatives of the local and Associated Press, it did not appear in any Atlanta paper, although it was printed in full in the daily papers in a number of the largest cities and some of the smaller cities also, as I remember particularly Knoxville, Tenn., being mentioned by one gentleman in a conversation among some members of the association in which the omission of the resolution from the Atlanta papers was the subject of comment. The reason for failure to print it will no doubt be explained to you by the publishers in Atlanta, if you care to take it up with them.

In this connection permit me to say, as you and I, as representatives of the organizations with which we are officially connected, met together in the St. Louis conference in June, 1904, on this question of the eight-hour workday, that I regret personally that your organization has seen fit to take such action in this matter that is from all indications undoubtedly calculated to create ill feeling between employe and employer and drive us farther apart, when those in the lead should be doing all in their power to bring them closer together, and arrange so that our business can be conducted on most amicable relations and with the least possible friction.

Of course, you are familiar with the present attitude of the employers and the decided stand they have taken all over the country on the question of the present enforcement of the eight-hour day: and knowing the character of the men who have taken this stand, you and I and all concerned know that it will mean, unless concessions are made, a hard and bitter fight. The employers absolutely can not stand the advance and will resist it, and in their position and under similar circumstances any intelligent man would be forced to do the same. The responsibility of bringing discontent and perhaps need on our people is a serious question. All fair employers would most sincerely regret any hardships that might come to their employes through any struggle over this question, but if it is forced upon them, the responsibility will be with those who make it necessary, and I trust that you and your associates will decide to give the matter such reconsideration as will obviate the necessity of the antagonism that seems so imminent.

Very truly yours,

F. C. NUNEMACHER.

REPLY.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., July 15, 1905.

F. C. Nunemacher, care of Nunemacher Press, Louisville, Ky.:

MY DEAR MR. NUNEMACHER—It has been impossible for me to take up your letter of July 6 until today.

Your assertions relative to the passage, by the manufacturers' association, of the resolution opposing the introduction of an eight-hour day in the book and job trade, and pledging support to the United Typothetæ in its fight against such a movement by the International Typographical Union, have been duly noted. I am also in receipt of the proceedings of the manufacturers' convention, in which this resolution appears.

This matter has been taken up at some length with Mr. Parry, and I presume he will follow the same course as with my previous letter on this subject, and forward you a copy. After a full consideration of both sides of this question, as covered in the correspondence with Mr. Parry, I can but repeat the observation contained in my letter to that gentleman, dated July 14, to wit:

As the matter stands, there is grave doubt in my mind relative to the passage of the resolution in question by your association. The silence of the press on the subject is especially noticeable. Your assertion that the reason for this is "that a great many newspaper publishers are under the coercive fear of the typographical union and will ofttimes decline to print news which might seem to antagonize it" is ridiculous, but I nevertheless hope you will give your views on that point to the press of the country.

As to the efforts of the International Typographical Union to enforce an eight-hour day, and your reference to the St. Louis conference, in which we both took part, permit me to say that the United Typothetæ is alone responsible for the condition of affairs prevailing, and a continuation of its present policy will make it also responsible for any warfare that may result at a later period.

I heartily agree with you in the declaration that "those in the lead should be doing all in their power to bring them (employer and employe) closer together, and arrange so that our business may be conducted on most amicable relations, and with the least possible friction." This spirit has animated the members of the executive council of the International Typographical Union for many years, but it does not seem to meet with a kindly response at the hands of the United Typothetæ and its officers. It was in this spirit that Messrs. Lynch, Miller and Bramwood asked for a conference on the eight-hour question with representatives of the typothetæ at its St. Louis meeting last year. It was in this spirit that we met with your executive committee and urged the consideration and settlement of the eight-hour question in an amicable manner. We told you then that our members desired an eight-hour day in the near future, and said we felt that if the matter was approached in the proper spirit the details of its inauguration could be amicably arranged. We referred to the manner in which the arrangements for the nine-hour day were completed in 1898, and offered to proceed on somewhat similar lines. All overtures were rejected by the United Typothetæ. Individually and officially, your executive committee informed us that no concessions would be granted on this point. The United Typothetæ, in reply to our request, passed the following, with which you are no doubt familiar:

Resolved, That the United Typothetæ of America declares that it is opposed to any reduction of the fifty-four-hour week; and, be it further

Resolved, That the United Typothetæ of America will resist any attempt on the part of the International Typographical Union to reduce the present hours of labor.

The convention of the International Typographical Union last August adopted a preamble and resolutions on this subject, with which you are familiar. The preamble set forth our attempt to effect an amicable adjustment, and continued as follows, on that point:

Whereas, The overtures for peace thus made were refused and declined, and replied to with a threat, combined with a practical declaration of war should any effort be made to achieve the shorter workday, as witness the language of the resolutions adopted by the late typothetæ convention; and,

Whereas, We reaffirm and again demand the eight-hour day for our book and job members;

Resolved, That we again declare our entire willingness to negotiate with the United Typothetæ for an agreement under which the eight-hour day will become operative, and so instruct our eight-hour committee.

This action of the convention was ratified by the membership by an overwhelming vote, at a later date.

Since that time, local unions and eight-hour conferences, though declaring their firm adherence to the eight-hour day in no uncertain terms, have invariably favored an agreement between the United Typothetæ and International Typographical Union, and suggested and urged a conference for the purpose of considering the eight-hour day and deciding upon a plan for its inauguration that would be mutually acceptable.

What has been the position of the United Typothetæ? Not in a single instance has it favored a peaceable settlement. At the meetings of book and job employers in various sections—dominated in each instance by typothetæ members, and urged to action by officers of the United Typothetæ—resolutions have invariably been adopted to this effect:

Resolved, That we are unalterably opposed to the inauguration of the eight-hour day as proposed by the International Typographical Union, to be effective January 1, 1906, and under no circumstances will we submit to it.

In no instance has the United Typothetæ responded to the sentiment for a peaceable adjustment, which is noticeable in the resolution adopted by the International Typographical Union, and quoted above. The tone of the employers' meetings has been warlike, rather than pacific.

At the Detroit conference a resolution of similar import to that before mentioned was introduced by a union representative. Representatives of the United Typothetæ were present, as well as the executive council of the International Typographical Union. Bear in mind that this resolution came from the union's side. A conference could have been arranged at that time. Though your executive officers could not be ignorant of the fact that this resolution for a conference met with the approval of the executive council of the International Typographical Union, yet they maintained absolute silence on the subject.

Thus the matter stands. The union is on record for a peaceable adjustment, if possible, and favors negotiations for such a settlement, while the typothetæ still appears to be "opposed to any reduction of the fifty-four-hour week" and determined "to resist any attempt * * * to reduce the present hours of labor."

Let me say that the executive council of the International Typographical Union stands ready and willing—as it has since the action was taken—to carry out the spirit and terms of the resolution adopted by our membership and quoted in this letter. We are willing, and always have been, to negotiate for an amicable adjustment, in line with this resolution. It would be useless to hold a conference, however, unless the United Typothetæ representatives approach the subject in a friendly manner. Nothing could be accomplished if the typothetæ representatives refused to consider a reduction of hours and simply reaffirmed the resolutions adopted at the St. Louis meeting in June last.

It would seem that some of the members of the typothetæ have been disposed to view the declaration of the union for a conference and an amicable settlement in the light of insincerity, and as a showing of weakness. I believe you will agree with me that those holding such a view are laboring under a delusion. It can be readily demonstrated that those who oppose warfare, so long as there is the least possibility of maintaining peaceable relations, generally prove the best and most resourceful fighters, once the battle is opened.

In conclusion, permit me to say that the members of our executive council are unanimously of the opinion that if a conference for the purpose of considering and effecting an amicable adjustment of the eight-hour question is to take place in the immediate future, it should be held prior to August 5, and in a city to be mutually agreed upon.

Very truly yours,

J. W. Bramwood.

The labor movement is more a question of humanity than the almighty dollar.

Note and Comment

San Francisco Union Wins.

We lift the forms of THE JOURNAL to present the following self-explanatory dispatch:

San Francisco, Cal., July 28, 1905.

But three former label offices, employing perhaps thirty compositors and forty pressmen and feeders, remain out. Eight additional offices reopened today as union eight-hour shops. Typothetæ says eight hours and our scale will prevail in all typothetæ offices, union and non-union, thus acknowledging complete defeat in nine-hour fight. F. J. Bonnington.

THE difference between the union scale and starvation wages is the price the non-unionist pays for "individual liberty." Rather a costly luxury.

THE press of San Francisco continues to support the printers of that city in their fight for the retention of the eight-hour day. Many splendid editorials are being printed along the line of those quoted from in last month's JOURNAL.

THE secretary of Vincennes (Ind.) Union No. 395 writes THE JOURNAL that the Knox County Democrat and A. V. Crott's job office of that place have been "closed" to union men in an effort to establish the "open shop." Funny way.

THE New York Association of Ex-Delegates to the International Typographical Union was organized July 16, with twenty-six members, and others coming in. Laws patterned after those of the Washington (D. C.) association were adopted. John F. Busche, '85, was elected president, and James M. Donohue, '94, secretary-treasurer.

"A CAPITALIST such as Collis P. Huntington, and his name is legion, after a long life spent in buying the aid of countless legislatures, will wax virtuously wrathful, and condemn in unmeasured terms 'the dangerous tendency of crying out to the government for aid' in the way of labor legislation. Without a quiver, a member of the capitalistic group will run tens of thousands of pitiful child laborers through his life-destroying cotton factories, and weep maudlin and constitutional tears over one scab hit in the back with a brick. He will drive a 'compulsory' free contract with an unorganized laborer on the basis of a starvation wage, saying, 'take it or leave it,' knowing that to leave it means to die of hunger, and in the next breath, when the organizer entices that laborer into a union, will storm patriotically about the inalienable right of all men to work."—Jack London, in "War of the Classes."

WE haven't seen any typothetæ circulars this month warning people to disregard newspaper reports. Perhaps the shoe is on the other foot this time, and the misleading reports carried by the press associations regarding conditions in San Francisco, Chicago and Philadelphia are more pleasing to the typothetæ than the truth would be. Don't swallow newspaper reports. Get your information from the "What We Are Doing" columns of THE JOURNAL. Selah!

ATTENTION of members is again called to the fact that any one is competent to propose changes in or additions to the International laws. In times past many such propositions, coming from individual members, not delegates, have been acted on favorably by the convention. A perusal of the proceedings of the last few conventions will verify this.

THE supreme court of Kansas has told the people of Kansas that they can not build their own oil refinery. It must be so, for the attorneys of the Standard Oil Company told the supreme court that the refinery law was unconstitutional.

THERE ought to be about fifty thousand printers in this country who call for the label when they buy anything. Can you account for your end of the proposition?

DON'T be afraid to work more than eight hours boosting the eight-hour movement.

'Frisco Sitting on the Lid.

After the utter defeat of their plans at St. Louis, the typothetæ agitators proceeded posthaste to the Pacific coast and endeavored to mislead the proprietors of that town into believing that the public wanted a return to the nine-hour day. Co-operating with the notorious citizens' alliance of that city, John Macintyre, the secretary of the United Typothetæ, prepared to show the employing book and job printers how to "ru(i)n their business." The utter disruption of the local branch of the International Typographical Union was billed to come off some time during last month, and the nine-hour day was to be reinaugurated with imposing ceremonies. But most of the employers were evidently satisfied with the results they were securing under the decent workday, and but sixteen shops were found ready to enter into the infamous deal. Eighty-eight announced their willingness to continue the eight-hour workday. Among the sixteen shops that were induced to declare war were two large ones—the Crocker office, the largest on the coast, being one of them. In all about 150 printers were locked out. Then the typothetæ walking delegates were required to show their much-heralded ability of furnishing strikebreakers. This they undertook to do. Carloads of the "free and independent" were shipped from the east (see article in this department headed "How the 'Free and Independent' Rode to 'Frisco"); but on the arrival of these cars many union men were found in them, they having taken advantage of the typothetæ's personally conducted tour and cheap excursion rates to the coast. The few non-unionists imported proved to be utterly incompetent, and were discharged in short order. Days went by, and not a wheel was turned in the unfair offices—not a line of type was set. No. 21 had the lid on and was sitting on the lid.

A few days after the lockout was inaugurated the Nevin company deserted the Macintyre forces and signed an eight-hour agreement.

Just as THE JOURNAL goes to press a telegram from the union officials announces that the Crocker company has signed a two-year contract calling for the eight-hour day. This effectively breaks the backbone of the lockout, and reduces the number of printers involved to about 100, scattered around among fourteen shops—most of which are small and unable to maintain the struggle alone, now that the big fellows have given in. Mr. Macintyre has not announced what his plans for the future are, or where he will retreat to.

It is becoming more evident day by day that a large proportion of the employing book and job printers are disposed to concede the eight-hour day, and that the opposition to this reform comes mainly from the talking delegates of the United Typothetæ and the advocates of the non-union shop and "free and independent" workmen.

C. W. Post in his latest screed against organized labor makes the following statement:

> Statistics show about twenty union men in every eight hundred citizens.

Let us do a little figuring on this proposition. The total population of the United States (including Alaska, Hawaii and the Indian reservations), according to the census report of 1900, was 76,303,387. The whole number of persons, ten years of age and over, engaged in gainful occupations was 29,285,922, including 211,805 persons in Alaska and Hawaii and in the military and naval service—about two-fifths of the population. The number of persons engaged in agricultural pursuits was 10,438,219. Those in professional service numbered 1,264,737. By subtracting the two last named from the aggregate of wageworkers, we find the total number of people supposedly competent to become members of unions to be 17,582,966. These figures would be further materially reduced by deducting therefrom the number of children included in the census report, but no statistics are given on this point. The paid-on membership of the American Federation of Labor was, at the time of its last report, 1,750,000. Add the number of unionists not affiliated with the American Federation, and you have, approximately, 2,000,000. By a very simple process of division you will arrive at the conclusion that about one person in every nine, supposedly eligible to become a member of a trade union, is a member. Can any other organization—social, fraternal or religious—show sucl. strength? Post has evidently arrived at his absurd figures by dividing the total population of the country—including the large proportion not competent to become members of trade unions—by the number of unionists in the United States.

Convention Program.

Secretary John Chinn, of the committee on arrangements at Toronto, has sent THE JOURNAL the following program of entertainment at the fifty-first session:

Saturday Evening—8 to 11 o'clock, reception in Rossin House, music and refreshments. Woman's auxiliary reception in hotel parlors.

Sunday Afternoon—Trip to Hanlan's Point; boats run every 15 minutes; military band concert from 3 to 5 P. M.; on close of concert special boat will convey all wearing badges to Island Park, where lunch will be served. Boat returns with party in time for evening concert at the Point from 8 to 10 o'clock.

Monday—Convention opens at 9 A. M. At 2 P. M. electric cars will leave the Rossin House, taking all delegates, ex-delegates, visitors and the woman's auxiliary for a view of the city. At 4 P. M. the party will go by boat to Island Park, where a garden party and band concert will take place. In the evening a dance and band concert will be given, to which members of No. 91 and their lady friends will also be invited.

Tuesday—Photo and visiting day.

Wednesday—Excursion to city of Hamilton by steamer Modjeska, leaving at 1:45 P. M. On reaching the Burlington piers the party will go by the radial railroad around Burlington Bay, thence through the city of Hamilton and by the incline railway to Mountain View Park, where dinner will be served. Returning, party will be taken to wharf by special cars, boat leaving at 8:45 sharp. Highlanders' band will accompany the excursion.

Thursday—Ex-delegates moonlight sail on Lake Ontario, per steamer Chippewa, leaving at 8 P. M. Vocal and military band concert will be given on board; also orchestra for dancing, etc. Boat returns to city at 12 P. M.

Friday—Visiting day—City Hall, Parliament Buildings and Colleges.

The Woman's Auxiliary will hold its sessions in Rossin House parlors.

Committeemen will meet all boats and trains. Look for the men with scarlet badges.

Parties arriving by train will take York street route for two blocks, which will land them at hotel headquarters; those coming by boats will proceed up Yonge street to King street, then to the left for two blocks.

Convention Hall is situated on Church street, between Green and Shuter streets.

All parties attending the convention will be invited guests of the Printers' Club, and will enjoy all privileges pertaining thereto.

All attending the convention should report to Room D, Rossin House, immediately on arrival.

Anent Credentials.

Delegates should deposit their credentials with Secretary-Treasurer Bramwood at the International headquarters at the Rossin House at the earliest possible moment after their arrival at Toronto. This action is necessary in order to prevent any delay in the seating of properly accredited delegates at the opening session, Monday, August 14.

Attention, Delegates!

Section 9, article iv, of the by-laws provides: "No delegate shall be entitled to vote in the convention of the International Union whose union has not previously paid over to the proper officers the per capita tax and all indebtedness of his union." Under this section unions must pay per capita tax up to and including the month of June, and all other indebtedness, before the opening of the convention, in order that delegates may be entitled to a seat and vote in the meeting. Delegates are urged to have the proper officers of their respective organizations forward all money due the International with as little delay as possible.

Headquarters Closed During the Convention.

The law requiring the president and secretary-treasurer to be in the convention city four days prior to the opening of the convention will result in the closing of headquarters for about twelve days from August 8. Arrangements have been perfected with the Indianapolis postoffice officials for the forwarding of all first-class mail, and every effort will be made to pay benefits and answer important correspondence promptly. Delays can not well be avoided during the progress of the convention, and due allowance should be made by local officers in case receipts, drafts and acknowledgments fail to reach them with the customary regularity. The Rossin House will be headquarters in Toronto, but under no circumstances should postoffice or express orders or other remittances be made payable at that city. Make all remittances payable at Indianapolis, as usual.

Committees Appointed.

Pursuant to the requirements of section 6, article v, by-laws, President Lynch has appointed the following delegates-elect as members of the committee on laws: Joe M. Johnson, of Columbia (Washington, D. C.) Union No. 101; Walter H. McKee, of New York Union No. 6; J. Vander Perel, of Denver (Colo.) Union No. 49; T. J. Creager, of Springfield (Ill.) Union No. 117; and Horace Johnson, of Memphis (Tenn.) Union No. 11. The committee will meet at the Rossin House, Toronto, Can., at 10 A. M. on Thursday, August 10, to select its chairman and secretary and to consider such proposed amendments to the laws of the International Typographical Union as may be submitted.

The fiftieth session of the International Typographical Union, held in St. Louis last year, adopted resolutions of which the following is the sense and effect:

That it is the sense of this convention that the International Typographical Union and the press telegraphers have certain mutual interests, which could be advanced by devising some plan of co-operation; that as soon as practicable after the election of delegates to the next International Typographical Union convention, the president is hereby instructed to appoint a committee of five, said committee to meet at least three days prior to the above-named convention, for the purpose of considering all propositions and suggestions submitted by either subordinate unions or representatives of the Commercial Telegraphers' Union, looking to a closer community of interests of the International Typographical Union and the press telegraphers; that the president be and is hereby empowered in the interim, to confer and co-operate with the president of the Commercial Telegraphers' Union, where our interests can be subserved.

In accordance with the instructions of the St. Louis convention, President Lynch has appointed the following committee: William E. Orser, of Rochester Typographical Union No. 15; A. H. Blain, of Seattle Typographical Union No. 202; T. F. Kane, of Boston Typographical Union No. 13; Emmett Whealan, of Chicago Typographical Union No. 16; and Charles J. Buehler, of Milwaukee Typographical Union No. 23.

The committee will meet at the Rossin House, Toronto, Canada, at 10 A. M. on Thursday, August 10, for the purpose of selecting a chairman and secretary and "considering all propositions and suggestions submitted by either subordinate unions or representatives of the Commercial Telegraphers' Union looking to a closer community of interests of the International Typographical Union and the press telegraphers."

The Man Grapenuts Made Famous.

The last few pages of the report of the proceedings of the annual meeting of the National Association of Manufacturers are taken up with the paper of C. W. Post, entitled, "Who Is the Owner?" It would be an insult to the intelligence of the reader for THE JOURNAL to attempt to point out the beauties of the gentleman's logic. A few choice gems are culled from the address and presented here:

The workman's little home, for which he has toiled and saved, will be ruthlessly taken from him by the mob when the labor union anarchists and socialists succeed in tearing down these laws that now insure the safety of the family, the home and the man's personal liberty.

We see on every hand labor union members assaulting honest bread earners, attacking and destroying property, conspiring to ruin business firms, blowing up mines and killing workmen. We see them stopping the production and delivery of meat and bread and even milk required to preserve the lives of young babes, and we are treated to the spectacle of hearses overturned and corpses thrown into the street under the eyes of the horrified friends and relatives.

When a manufacturer operates a closed shop he prostitutes his American manhood.

Modern unionism is like a fixed and chronic disease—once it becomes fastened to the victim, slowly and surely pushes him daily closer to the grave.

Let no manufacturer give a letter of recommendation to any workman who has been a dissatisfied malcontent and agitator, or a striker, stone thrower, scab shouter or insulter of other and more decent workmen. Then let no employer hire a man unless he can show a clean record as a desirable man and bring with him a good testimonial from his former employer.

Discharge union men promptly and for all time when you learn of the little and big acts of meanness or incivility with which they are prone to insult other men with whom they work.

Digitized by Google

Put in as many apprentices as your own judgment dictates, absolutely without regard to any union rules.

Pay your high-grade, skilled men the very best wages the condition of trade will permit, remembering that such men at high wages are the cheapest in the end.

Grade your wages to fit the capabilities of each man.

There is a growing tendency in labor union circles toward being "babied." If a worker saws off his finger or has any sort of an accident, he wants the employer to pay for it. There seems to be no corresponding provision on the part of the labor union to pay damages to a manufacturer that loses health in the struggle to meet union rules, keep alive and find money each week to pay his employes.

A home is the bright lodestar that every right-minded man centers his mind upon and strives for. We owe to our faithful people help to get a home all their own. They are not always able to plan as wisely as the trained mind of "the boss."

I can see that a man would be fresher for only eight hours' manual labor than ten, but the machinery such a man runs will produce exactly twenty per cent. less in eight hours than in ten hours, and when one remembers the law of the unions to produce not as much as a man can but as litle as will hold the job, the claim seems to fade into thin air.

Wear the I. T. U. Button.

Do you wear the button of the International Typographical Union? You say you don't believe in wearing buttons? Do you remember last fall when you had a big Parker or perhaps a Roosevelt button on the lapel of your coat? You say: "Oh, well, that was in campaign time." That's just the point. It's campaign time now. We have the biggest kind of a campaign on—the eight-hour campaign. And it means a great deal more to you than did the election of either Parker or Roosevelt. Every man who wears a button is helping to boost the shorter workday. It may be a little thing—but so is the label.

JOHN KIRBY, JR., of Dayton, Ohio, declined the nomination for treasurer at the recent meeting of the National Association of Manufacturers. Quite a number of the union baiters seem to be getting cold feet.

How the "Free and Independent" Traveled to 'Frisco.

The following graphic account of the methods of the United Typothetæ of America in importing "free and independent" workmen to the city of San Francisco to take the place of locked-out union men may be of interest to readers of THE JOURNAL, as showing to what depths the employers' organization will descend. The article is taken from a San Francisco paper, and is in line with the accounts published by all the daily papers of that city.

Locked in a tourist sleeping car, guarded at both entrances by armed detectives, twenty-six strikebreakers were brought to this city yesterday afternoon. On their arrival they were taken in three 'buses to the Commercial Publishing Company's establishment at 463 Mission street, where they were herded like cattle and conveyed to the fourth floor, which has been turned into a temporary abode for them, cots and cooking utensils and a gas range having been installed there for that purpose. There are two women in the party, one of whom is a widowed mother with a babe of three months, and the other a woman sixty-five years old, the mother of one of the strikebreakers.

This party of strikebreakers was gathered in St. Louis by one A. C. Bremer, of the Greeley Printery of that city, assisted by Attorney Cornet of the same place. They have been brought out here to be put to work in the printing houses which have locked out the eight-hour men.

At 12:30 yesterday afternoon the train carrying these men arrived at the Sixteenth street station, Oakland. There it was side-tracked to a point near the shore, and the entire number were transferred to a launch and crowded into the cabin—men, women and children. They were conveyed to a pier near the Pacific Mail docks, where, without the aid of a ladder, they were hauled to the wharf, hand over hand.

Three 'buses met them and took them to the Commercial Publishing Company's building. Since their arrival there three of the men have deserted the crowd on account of the misrepresentations made to them of the accommodations that were promised them. Six guards now are watching the entrance to this building.

TELLS OF THE TRIP.

One of the men who escaped tells a graphic story of the manner in which they were handled on their trip to this city, and of the false representations of the way they were to be treated on their arrival here. He said:

"This party was gathered up by a man named A. C. Bremer, assisted by Attorney Cornet, both of St. Louis. They told us that we would be provided with accommodations in standard sleepers and that during the entire trip we were to be treated as ladies and gentlemen, with no curtailments upon our movements, and that, upon our arrival here, we would be provided with the best of hotel accommodations.

"As far as Sacramento we were treated half way decently, with the exception that we were obliged to travel in a tourist sleeping car instead of a standard Pullman. At Sacramento our car, which had been in the middle part of the train all the way out, was taken to the rear end of the train, the entrances were both locked and armed guards stationed themselves at each entrance.

"We were deprived of all newspapers. This order was unnecessarily given, as the guards and a man named William Jenkins bought up all the papers from the newsboys. Since Thursday evening we had had nothing to eat. We were promised breakfast at Tracy, but for some reason we did not receive it. When we arrived at the Sixteenth street station our car was sidetracked to a point near the shore, and, like cattle, we were herded into a launch, the entire twenty-six of us being crowded into the cabin. The armed guards stationed themselves at each end of the boat and kept their revolvers in plain sight of all.

"The bay was exceedingly rough and it is only a miracle that the boat was not swamped and many of us drowned. The most pathetic scene was enacted on the boat. The mother, who is not over twenty-one years old, with her little three-months old babe in her arms, was doing her best to keep back her tears. She seemed to realize that something awful was in store for her, and the armed guards that were in our sight all the way from Sacramento, added much to her fright. All she could do was to hug her little babe and weep.

THE WOMEN WEEP.

"In another corner of the boat stood the aged mother and her son, who had come along as one of the strikebreakers. She, too, was weeping, and her son was doing his best to comfort her.

"The boat pulled up at a wharf near the Pacific Mail docks, and the landing was fully eight feet above us. The guard first got up to the landing and then, with the assistance of another man of the party, the men were first lifted hand over hand to the landing. When it came to getting the women up, one of the men grabbed the babe from the mother and said, 'Here, take this first,' and, as if it had been a mere rag doll, handed the child upside down to a guard. Next the mother was pulled up. When it came to the old woman, her son objected.

" 'You will have to get a ladder for my mother,' he said. 'I won't stand for this.' Whereupon one of the guards said, 'Oh, to hell with her and your ladder,' and with that two men grabbed her hands and pulled her to the wharf, her breast rubbing against the piles and tearing her clothing.

"No sooner were we all ashore than we were hustled to three cabs and driven to the Commercial Publishing Company. Several of us protested to going into the building when we discovered what kind of a house we had been taken to. We inquired if this was the hotel that we had been promised. Jenkins answered:

" 'We are taking you here merely to straighten out matters with the publishers, and after that you will be taken to a hotel.'

"But when we stepped out of the elevator we found the room a place filled with cots and cooking utensils. The apartment is divided in two sections by a curtain. One is for the men, the other for the women. It is like a large dormitory.

THE MEN ESCAPE.

"On the pretense of taking his fourteen-year-old son, who is also one of the party, out to get medical attention to a wound received from a Fourth of July accident, one of the men escaped; another on the pretense of needing a shave, and myself on my own statements that everything had been grossly misrepresented."

William Jenkins, who, it is said by the members of the Typographical Union, takes pride in declaring that he is a professional strikebreaker, and who took a leading part in the herding of the men, women and children to the Commercial Publishing Company's establishment, was boastful in his manner. Backed up by five other guards at the building, he absolutely refused admission to the building, and would not discuss, as he said, "the matter with any newspaper reporter," but was very anxious to impress the reporter with the abilities and power of the strikebreakers, and of the absolute uselessness of the members of the Typographical Union to "buck them" in their mission to this city. He said that there had been a "few gunfighters" in the party as far as Ogden, but that they had been put off the train there.

Out of the men, women and children who arrived yesterday there is a probability that six of them will go over to the cause of the Typographical Union. This was learned from conversation with them on the train by the man who has furnished the very graphic description of the manner in which the strikebreakers were transferred to this city.

Employers of the Central Northwest.

On July 20 the employers of the central northwest, or some of them, had a mass meeting in Milwaukee. The procedure was similar to like meetings held in St. Paul, Kansas City, Atlanta, Boston and Philadelphia. As usual, a union well-wisher was in attendance, and he writes:

The 250 delegates to the convention of the United Typothetæ of the central northwest, who met at Milwaukee, in the Pfister House, Thursday, July 20, were unanimous in declaring their willingness to fight the demand of the International Typographical Union for an eight-hour workday. It is reported that thirty-eight of the delegates were from Chicago. Among the speakers were the following prominent Chicago printers: Thomas E. Donnelley, treasurer of the association; A. R. Barnes, P. F. Pettibone. A. J. Aiken, of the Evening Wisconsin, of Milwaukee, delivered the opening address, and part of his remarks were to the effect that since the inauguration of the nine-hour workday three years ago, his firm has been unable to pay dividends to stockholders, and that if the typographical union should succeed in establishing an eight-hour day it would mean ruin to the printing industries. Thomas E. Donnelley followed, and said in part that since the Faithorn Printing Company have opened their office a committee of the union called on him and made the threat that if any other member of the typothetæ shall attempt to follow the lead of the Faithorn Company they will immediately call a general strike regardless of existing contracts. "Personally," said Mr. Donnelley, "I am ready and willing right now to commence the struggle, instead of waiting for the first of January. I am not in favor of breaking contracts, but if they (the union) force the issue, I am ready to fight to a finish." [There are no contracts existing between Chicago Typographical Union and Mr. Donnelley. Possibly he meant contracts with his customers.] He also said Faithorn's had had no trouble in securing help—competent and efficient, and he was satisfied that no difficulty would be experienced in securing all the non-union help necessary for any shop in Chicago. Not one of the 250 delegates spoke in favor of shortening the present working agreement of fifty-four hours a week. They even expressed the hope that after January 1, 1906, they will be able to refuse to sign contracts with any labor unions. William Green, vice-president, advised the members of the typothetæ to prepare themselves for the fight by starting schools, hiring more apprentices, and in every way teaching the trade to as many as they can reach. Reference was made to the affirmative vote of the International Typographical Union on the eight-hour day, and it was assumed that all the other members of the union—those against and those not voting—would stick by the proprietors. That all others were newspaper men, and would place the burden on the jobmen. President Ellis, in reply to a question from a Chicago employer, stated that the United Typothetæ was always ready to confer with the union, but that the proposition of negotiating with the union necessitated the taking up of only the method of putting the eight-hour day into effect, which he compared to painting a house. The union agreed to consider the advisability of such work, but insisted that the color should be red. While agreeing apparently to the question, they insisted that the work should be done only in a certain way and a certain color, therefore agreeing only to one phase of the negotiations and that to their benefit. Criticism was made of the eight-hour lists sent out by the International Typographical Union, with the statement that the International was misrepresenting the facts and that these towns did not have the eight-hour day, and that the only eight-hour towns were inconsequential.

A great stack of regrets were read from proprietors all over the country, who pledged assistance and support. One delegate called attention to the $10 initiation fee and the $2 per month dues, and complained of the hardship, which he said was unjust. In reply a town was cited in which only four printers were employed. A strike had been called and the typothetæ paid $2,000 strike funds, in spite of the fact that before the strike only $8 had been contributed by the town in question. This policy would be adhered to and unlimited money and influence was pledged to the small printer. They must win in their controversy.

WANT TROUBLE IMMEDIATELY.

In reply to a delegate asking whether it would not be advisable to wait until January 1, 1906, a Philadelphia printer's reply was that the union was busily at work and had agents everywhere, and that the union would be in better condition to fight in January than would the typothetæ. An army of soldiers would not wait until the enemy invaded their country. The unions were spending large sums of money in perfecting their organization and the typothetæ should not delay. Mr. Green made reply that it "was laughable to think that in case of a general strike the unions would not have money enough to last a week. As for us, we have 100 per cent more money than the union and will have much more when every employing printer joins our organization." He said the typothetæ must have money. The fight was for all—the large and the small alike, and that the big fellows would not go down in their pockets for the little fellows, and the small proprietors must put up the 50 cents a week if they desired support. Mr. Nunemacher, of Louisville, said for twenty-one years he had run an open shop; that he was not feeling well, and his doctor prescribed rest, but he would have to live and work a few years yet; that if he should die and be cremated, a red streak would be found in his ashes, which could be read "non-union."

Mr. Franks, of Peoria, said 45 per cent of the employing printers of his town were present, and said that during the fight he would order a banner bearing the inscription:

One Chicago employer was very excited and said that an honest non-union man was called "scab" and "fink," and that every effort should be made to advance the honest non-union man to the standard of the proprietors.

One old gentleman was in favor of very radical measures and showing no mercy; that the organization (the International Typographical Union) was doing all in its power to ruin the master printers. "Fight them until their confounded organization is put out of business." Mr. Ellis said it was a crime and against the constitution to make a contract with organized labor. It was detrimental to the willing non-union workers, and tended to deprive them of making a living. That he hoped they would never be under obligation to sign any agreement in the future. This seemed to be the prevailing sentiment. Mr. Green said organizers would be sent only to such towns as were absolutely necessary. Several men were now at work, but it was impossible to visit every town and every proprietor. Master printers were intelligent and should come forward willingly. He pleaded for harmony and cohesion. Go to their customers, explain the situation to them, ask their support, show them where it would be to their advantage, point out to them that prices will advance 20 per cent if the eight-hour day is adopted. If there is a strike in your plants, ask them to bear with it, and so far as possible overlook such items as work being late or not furnished at all. Help each other get out work, three or four club together and go to each other's plant, roll up your sleeves and go to work. The object of the convention was to gain members for the typothetæ and try and whip the independents into line. Claim was made that by the time of the United Typothetæ convention 90 per cent of the employing printers of the northwest would be members of the United Typothetæ of America. Not one friend of organized labor spoke, and the speeches were bitter against unions and union men. A committee of nine was appointed to draw up resolutions. The most important resolution, and the one likely to cause immediate trouble, was the following, adopted with a slight scattering of nays: "Resolved, That the employing printers of the northwest here assembled recommend that all employing printers who employ union labor and where no contracts now exist be urged to open their shops at once, and that those employing printers who are now under contract open their shops as soon as present contracts expire."

THE USUAL RESOLUTIONS.

The resolutions adopted by a rising vote also put the convention on record as "unalterably opposed," etc.

After a closing address by Mr. Green, in which he advised the employing printers, large and small alike, to stand together as the only way to win, the convention adjourned.

Readers of THE JOURNAL should compare the attitude of Mr. Nunemacher at this meeting with the statements contained in his letter to Secretary-Treasurer Bramwood, given under the head "Seeking a Sponsor," elsewhere in this issue.

Again, when reading the warlike utterances of Mr. Donnelly, of Chicago, it would be well to bear in mind that less than one-third of the book and job members of Chicago Union are employed in typothetæ offices.

If non-unionists are so plentiful, why was it that the national typothetæ's secretary could not secure a sufficient number for San Francisco?

EVERY time you call for the label you are helping some union maintain proper conditions and decent wages.

THE open shop is generally open just wide enough to admit the non-unionist.

High Authority.

The London Lancet is being quoted in the grape-nut ads as saying that Post's concoction is a "complete food," and is of the "highest nutritive value." It was not so very long ago that the American Tobacco Company was quoting the Lancet as saying that cigarettes were all right. Next!

And still they come. The latest question-mark circular emanates from the typothetæ secretary at Milwaukee. That official was trying to work up a mass meeting of the employers in that vicinity. The results of the call are printed in another column. The chief feature of this circular was that it ended up with a question instead of starting with one. This question is: "What Are We Going to Do?"

A Good Time For the Home Boys.

D. C. MacWatters, general passenger agent of the Colorado Springs and Cripple Creek Railway Company, invited the residents of the Home to be the guests of that road for a special trip to Rosemont, Clyde, Cripple Creek, or any point that might be designated. It was decided to stop at the principal scenic points on the road, and the company made arrangements to entertain those who went in splendid style. On behalf of the residents of the Home, Superintendent Deacon accepted the invitation, and the trip was made on Thursday, July 27.

Trade Schools.

The United Typothetæ of America has been getting all worked up over the trade school proposition. Those at the head of the organization were of the belief that schools established in various parts of the country, under the control of the typothetæ, would mean the solution of the "labor question." Accordingly master printers in different parts of the country were communicated with, and they were asked to give their views on the subject. About a hundred replies were received, and a typothetæ organ publishes extracts from the letters of the employers. One proprietor does not favor the trade school, as he says, "The open shop will accomplish the same result." Another says: "What is the use, if all the graduates become members of labor unions?" Still another asserts that "unless some plan like this is carried out we will soon be at the mercy of the unions." One employer is frank enough, for he asks the question: "What benefit would be derived by the typothetæ?" Then comes another with the startling assertion: "If all shops were open and depended upon merits of workmen, wages would be higher; the poor workman would be relegated to the rear and the efficient would seek employment where he is fitted." The following suggestion is offered by one writer: "Students should bind themselves to remain free from union control for five years after apprenticeship." The trade school plan was endorsed by a recent meeting of the Citizens' Industrial Alliance of New York city, which resolved that "artisan schools should be established by states, giving a diploma which shall represent the right to practice a trade."

Digitized by Google

It takes all kinds of people to make the world.

Help To Boost.

Some of the craft-labor papers have used their license to criticise in such a way as to seriously menace our eight-hour movement, either through deliberate intent, misunderstanding or culpable ignorance. These papers have never lost an opportunity to assault the officers in charge of the movement, or to endeavor to weaken the confidence of the membership in these officers. In direct—but none the less appreciated—contrast to these papers is the attitude of the vast majority of the labor press. The editors last mentioned never overlook an opportunity to support the eight-hour movement, and frequently devote a large amount of space to the reproduction of eight-hour circulars and eight-hour information from THE JOURNAL, and some of them print monthly the revised list of the unions that have or have arranged for the eight-hour day. This support is not only welcomed by the International eight-hour committee, but we believe it is also appreciated by the membership at large.

The Manufacturers' Convention.

THE JOURNAL has been favored with a copy of the proceedings of the tenth annual convention of the National Association of Manufacturers. It is an imposing document of some three hundred pages. There are some very funny things in it. For instance, the prayer of the Rev. E. C. Bowman, who opened the session on the first day, contained the following: "We pray Thee that all of these interests (the manufactories represented) may be managed by these, Thy servants, to whom Thou hast in Thy providence entrusted them, for the advancement of Thy kingdom, the good of mankind and the glory of Thy name."

The following, from the address of Mayor James G. Woodward, of Atlanta, must have proved rather startling to the assembled union wreckers:

> Remember that all men are born equal; and while you are more fortunate in the possession of worldly riches than others, remember still that none of your wealth can be taken with you on your final journey across the dark waters. Bear well in mind that "there is no pocket in a shroud." And when you have finished your course on this earth may you be greeted in the other land with the plaudit: "You have done unto others as you would have them do unto you."

Under the head "All the Labor Bills Beaten," in the national secretary's report, is the following:

> At the last session of congress there was naturally a likelihood that both these bills (the eight-hour bill and the anti-injunction bill) would be voted upon. In the senate labor committee nothing of the kind happened, its chairman offering to the labor lobbyists, as an excuse for not calling his committee together and seeking to get a vote, the fact that the house labor committee had the question under consideration. The house labor committee, finding, very greatly to the satisfaction of nearly all its members, that the report of the department of commerce and labor on the eight-hour question was friendly to the manufacturers' and employers' contention, took no action whatever. This was also a harmless piece of consideration for the labor lobbyists, because, if any one had cared enough about pressing a dead issue, the vote to report the eight-hour bill adversely would have been overwhelming.
> The anti-injunction situation developed an unusually interesting incident. The administration, in so far as Commissioner Garfield could represent it, put forward a "mild" anti-injunction bill, its object having been stated by Mr. Garfield to be to "ease off" labor agitation, to quiet the "government by injunction" issue, and presumably to make the imaginary "labor vote" quite friendly. It happened this time again that the manufacturers and employers of the country (under the leadership, as before, of the National Association) were thoroughly organized for all emergencies. So numerously and sharply were all of our individual members and the officers and members of our allied organizations aroused, that not only was the Garfield anti-injunction bill kept safely in its proper sub-committee, but the old anti-injunction bill of the previous session, the Gompers-Grosvenor proposition, was disposed of finally by a vote of 8 to 4; consideration indefinitely postponed.

Another source of congratulation is that in the senate and the house labor committees and in the house judiciary committee, all of the three committees in the two sessions of the last congress which had to do with "labor" legislation, democrats joined with republicans and republicans joined with democrats to turn away everything of the kind.

All of which is rather illuminating.

Further along in the secretary's report is described the association's annual directory. This book contains the name of each member and the business represented by him. The secretary suggests that it be consulted whenever it is desired to buy anything. It is, in fact, a sort of a fair list.

Coming on down through the various addresses and resolutions, the squabble over the election of president is reached. This "unfortunate" incident has been pretty generally aired in the press, but there are a few features that may be of interest. Mr. Ittner, chairman of the committee on nominations, presented the name of David M. Parry. Then Mr. Jenkinson, of New Jersey, asked the secretary to read the following from James Inglis, a member who had been called home:

As a member of the executive committee and chairman of an important committee, and as one, perhaps, in as close touch with association affairs as any man on the floor, I wish to urge the members to vote for Mr. Tompkins. We must have a new leader and new issues or the association can not live.

Then Mr. Jenkinson nominated Mr. McCarroll, of New York, for president.

Mr. Tompkins was nominated by Mr. Jenkinson upon Mr. McCarroll declining, and Mr. Farrand, of Michigan, in seconding this nomination, said:

I desire to second that, Mr. Chairman. No one here is unmindful of the services Mr. Parry has rendered this association. He has done good work and every one of us appreciates it; but I do believe, for the interests of our association in every way, that we had better elect at this time another president.

Mr. Pike, of New Hampshire, expressed a desire to speak on the nomination of Parry. He started by saying:

I want to speak on the nomination of Mr. Parry. I regret, gentlemen, that I am not all experienced in these matters, but I do want to bring before this convention one or two thougats. I do not think Mr. Parry has had any stronger admirer than your humble servant, but it has seemed to me that this labor question had received—

Right here is where the gag was applied. It is not a hard matter to see what the gentleman was driving at. The chairman decided he was out of order.

So the slate was put through.

Then the various other officers were elected and there was nothing left to do but adjourn.

Post Advocates the Eight-Hour Day(?)

Along the line of the "Proclamation of Freedom" which he recently inflicted on a long-suffering public, C. W. Post is out with another half-page of stuff in the leading papers of the country. It is one of the funniest things C. W. has written. It is headed "You Are Your Brother's Keeper." We had almost despaired of ever reading anything from Post's pen that contained a grain of common sense, but his latest screed embraces one startling paragraph that seems strangely out of place. It reads:

I am an open advocate of high wages and an eight-hour day, and will support peaceful methods which do not oppress others in bringing them about.

Well, wouldn't that jar you? Wonder if the Post employes in the grapenut foundry at Battle Creek will believe this.

FORT WAYNE (Ind.) UNION No. 78 is arranging for an eight-hour conference of representatives of all typographical unions in the state of Indiana, to take place on Tuesday, September 26. The Indiana Federation of Labor meets in Fort Wayne on September 26, 27 and 28, and it is the intention to have the delegates from typographical unions participate in the conference.

An Employer's Views.

In the July Inland Printer, W. H. Cherouny, owner and manager of a large printing office in the city of New York, discusses the typothetæ question-mark circulars in a way which must afford cold comfort to their author. He takes up the various questions and answers them in a calm and convincing manner, showing the typothetæ that it is engaged in a hopeless task in trying to combat the eight-hour day. In speaking of this opposition to the shorter workday he says:

> Compulsory retention of the nine-hour day will not relieve the strain of unwise competition, which is the first cause of all the troubles of the trade. Nor will an entire or partial victory of the employers forever fix the nine-hour day any more than did the ludicrous attempt of the New Yorkers to buy it from the smiling Union No. 6 for an advance in wages. The eight-hour day will come, if not now, certainly within ten years. The movement for its introduction is prompted by the spirit of the age; that is, by the universal opinion of the people in regard to the means of securing their temporal happiness. No single trade, no church, no state can build a dyke against the wave of popular volition rolling toward this beacon fire, which is enkindled by the ever yearning human heart.

The particular typothetæ circular which Mr. Cherouny dissects contains the question: "Have you reckoned the increased cost and the decreased output?" He answers this as follows:

> Who can exactly determine a compositor's daily output and measure the difference between one of eight and one of nine hours? The total product of a composing room depends not only on the skill and dexterity of the employes; not only on the arrangement and abundance of tools, but mostly on the good will, health and energy of the rank and file. These are incalculable conditions which render all theories on the subject most problematic. I fear though that most employers will have a hard stand. But brains are made to help men out of every scrape in which they fall through passion.

Continuing to answer the questions asked by the typothetæ secretary, Mr. Cherouny says:

> Next I am told that I ought to pay my share into the strike fund, inasmuch as I would certainly participate in the benefits which would accrue from its expenditure for a strike. Without argument I asked, How much? and was informed that $700 would be my assessment. Then I thought of Ben Franklin and said: This is too much for the whistle. For my own firm can not strike. It must produce week by week about three million ems for weeklies and monthlies. Every day has its pensum and every shortage through holidays or untoward events must be made up by work in overtime. This task requires compositors who are not only skilful, but also reliable. I find it very difficult even in times of peace to get men of such high technical and moral order as I need. Will any employer tell me that the non-union chaff of the street could even bridge over a strike? One lost day would put my work in disorder. Three days would carry misfortune into the offices of twenty-five customers, who are my best friends. One week's stoppage would ruin my business. If I meant to strike and remain honest, I would have to begin by declaring officially: Gentlemen, after the first of January, 1906, I can no longer be responsible for the publications in my charge. Enough! there will be no strike in Cherouny's.

The gentleman's letter in the July Inland Printer is worthy the perusal of all employers. Mr. Cherouny professes no love for the International Typographical Union, and this fact will tend to give his utterances further interest to the employers generally. Appealing to them as business men on a business proposition, he advises them to get down to earth and calmly consider where "they are at." Such words of wisdom from the employers' side of the question are certainly encouraging to us in our campaign.

The Label.

Our label is cutting quite a figure in the eight-hour agitation. It is conceded in a number of localities that the shorter workday will be granted by the employers simply because they can not afford to dispense with the services of the little joker. There are any number of large printing offices throughout the country that have contracts calling for the label on certain publications, and its omission would mean the cancellation of the contract. And in the smaller shops the demand for the label is even more insistent. In fact, there are many small offices in every locality that would not be union were it not that this is the only condition on which they can secure the use of that very popular little emblem. A judicious booming of the little joker will prove a valuable adjunct to the eight-hour propaganda. Set aside a sum for advertising the label—it will be money wisely spent. Milwaukee Union recently embarked in a billboard campaign. Other unions are using cards in street cars. Circular letters and even newspaper advertising are proving helpful. A very effective way of using newspaper space is to take a few inches in some paper that carries the label at the head of its editorial column. Call the readers' attention to the fact that his favorite paper is the product of union men, and thus make it personal with him. Get busy, for after January 1 the little joker will stand for eight hours.

Satisfied With the Shorter Workday.

The Denver (Colo.) correspondent of THE JOURNAL records an interesting fact. The allied printing trades of Denver, as all know, are working but eight hours a day. The time for either side to file notice of a wish to open the agreement was at the meeting on July 19. The correspondent writes that there was "nothing doing" in this respect. Evidently the shorter workday is satisfactory to the employers of that city.

Eight-Hour Conference.

An eight-hour conference of Texas typographical unions was held in Dallas on June 19, in response to a call issued by San Antonio Union No. 172. The meeting was a success from every standpoint, twelve cities being represented. A most interesting and profitable feature of the conference was the reading of statistical reports by the various delegates on the condition of their respective unions. A tabulation of these reports shows that the district is in splendid condition, the towns being almost one hundred per cent. organized, and a number of them now working under the eight-hour day. In addition to this thirty-nine offices have signified their intention to grant the shorter workday. A large defense fund has been collected and is being collected that will go a long way toward making the eight-hour day unanimous. Walton Peteet, of San Antonio, has an excellent account of the meeting in the correspondence department of THE JOURNAL.

HISTORY tells us that printers used to have a certain rank and be entitled to carry swords. A mixup with the typothetæ in those days must have been interesting.

"Forgot" the Credit.

Pursuant to its published intention THE JOURNAL herewith records several instances of piracy coming to its notice during the last month. The following publications clipped matter from THE JOURNAL and used it without giving credit, evidently seeking to create the impression that the articles were their own:

Industrial Pointers (Hutchinson, Kan.) republished five original JOURNAL articles in its issue of June 27, without giving credit. The JOURNAL matter used in this issue without credit comprised about one-sixth of the whole paper.

The International Horseshoers' Monthly Magazine for June took three original JOURNAL items, and used one of them, head and all ("A Deceptive Phrase"), as a leading article—and forgot the credit.

The Labor Advocate (Albuquerque, N. M.) of June 29 used one original JOURNAL article—and forgot the credit.

The Labor News (Eureka, Cal.) of July 1 used an original JOURNAL article in its editorial column—also forgot to credit.

The Terre Haute Labor News has evidently been forgetful along the same line. The Trades Union Advocate (Trenton, N. J.) publishes an article headed "The Greatest Enemy," which originally appeared in THE JOURNAL, and credited it to the Labor News of Terre Haute. Of course, the Trades Union Advocate is not to blame in this instance, but it only goes to show one of the results of plagiarism.

The Quarry Workers' Journal (Barre, Vt.), for July, took the article headed "A Deceptive Phrase," which recently appeared in THE JOURNAL, and tried to pass it off as original. At least the paper gave no credit. Will J. Rohr, of Minneapolis, had a splendid article on the label, headed, "What It Stands For," in the April JOURNAL. The Quarry Workers' Journal used this on its editorial page—without credit to Mr. Rohr. THE JOURNAL extends its sympathy to the gentleman.

The Voice (Winnipeg, Man.) used an original JOURNAL article in its issue of July 14—and forgot the credit.

The Labor Leader (Baltimore, Md.) of July 15, used a JOURNAL article in its editorial column—and forgot the credit.

The Labor News (Greensboro, N. C.) of July 13, filled up a column on its editorial page with JOURNAL matter—and forgot the credit.

The Bridgeman's Magazine for July used one JOURNAL article—and forgot the credit.

The Blacksmith's Journal for July keeps it up. This month only about a column and a half of original JOURNAL matter is used without credit. We begin to have hopes.

The New Era (Louisville, Ky.) of July 22 uses about a column of original JOURNAL matter in its editorial column—and forgot the credit.

That will be about all. The editor of THE JOURNAL had no idea this thing was going to take up so much space. We confess it is too big a proposition to cope with, and hereby announce that we are through with it. We do not care to inflict a list like this on the reader every month, so will take no more notice of the matter. Life is too short.

ON the letterheads used by the manufacturers' association appears the following significant line: "We protect you from vicious legislation." Vicious legislation in this case can only be interpreted to mean legislation that is not in accord with the views of the association. How this protection is furnished is not made plain. It has come to a pretty pass when an association of a few manufacturers can thus advertise the fact that they furnish "protection"—that is to say, can influence legislation at will.

A MAN who has sufficient intelligence to be a competent printer has sufficient intelligence to see the advantages of becoming a member of the International Typographical Union, and will avail himself of that privilege. A man who has not sufficient intelligence to see the advantages of affiliating himself with his fellow men to secure better wages and conditions, has not sufficient intelligence to be a competent printer. Therefore, nearly all competent printers are members of the International Typographical Union.

ONE of the typothetæ organs publishes an account of the recent Philadelphia typothetæ meeting, and comments on the address delivered by Edward Meyers, of the Co-Operative Press of New York city, in which he endorsed the eight-hour day and declared that his firm had prospered under an eight-hour agreement. The said typothetæ organ, after referring to Mr. Meyers as a young man of "socialistic tendencies," attemps to belittle him and injure his business reputation by declaring that his firm is rated in the credit agency as fair, and that its capital amounts to but a few thousand dollars. Apparently you have to think as the ring does or it will ruin your business if possible.

The Rat Shop's Thin Disguise.

The following ad was placed in a number of eastern papers by the San Francisco Citizens' Alliance when the attempt was made by a few offices in that city to return to the nine-hour day:

WANTED—Competent men in the printing trades. San Francisco pays the highest wages in the United States. Permanent jobs given to good non-union men who can furnish satisfactory references. This is not a strike-breaking proposition; the Pacific coast typothetae has decided to go to the open shop, and that means jobs for competent men and absolute protection. Address, W. E. Alexander, secretary Citizens' Alliance, 501 Crossley Building, San Francisco.

Same old story. They claim they wish to establish the open shop, and advertise for non-unionists. Slowly but surely the mask is being torn from the open shop proposition, and it stands revealed as the non-union shop pure and simple.

Regarding Child Labor.

"Child labor is the product of commercialism, as commercialism is the product of civilization," said Edgar T. Davis, chief factory inspector of Illinois, in an address before the National Conference of Charities and Corrections at Portland, Ore.

"Poverty, in a great many instances," continued the speaker, "has been the basic cause of the child's undoing. Social conditions in this country of ours have produced greater prosperity for the rich and greater poverty for the poor."

The speaker pointed out the selfishness of employers who found child labor could be made to produce results cheaply, and added, "And the child becomes a pale-faced fragment of human mechanism. The competition of children and women and machines has reduced the wages of men. Child labor becomes not alone a menace to the wage schedule, but it imperils the very future of the republic itself. It threatens the public schools, the bulwark of the nation. Employment should be prohibitive for any girl under the age of sixteen in any vocation where she is compelled to remain standing. The employment of minors at night should be absolutely prohibited."

The above might have well been directed at the Parry Manufacturing Company of Indianapolis. Hundreds of children are employed in that factory. The daily papers of the city frequently carry standing ads from this company for "boys," and these boys are said to be paid an average wage of about $2 per week.

In this connection it should also be remembered that Mr. Parry and his satellites, speaking for the National Association of Manufacturers, the Citizens' Industrial Alliance, and the "business interests," strenuously opposed any amendment of the child labor laws of the state of Indiana at the last legislative session. And they succeeded in defeating a measure calculated to make existing laws on that subject more stringent and to provide additional safeguards. What do they care for the children!

Labor unions will continue their struggle against the evil of child labor, and some day —we hope not far in the future—the right-thinking people of the land will join in the fight and crush this monster that is devouring the children.

Second Class Mail Rates.

Congressman Overstreet, of Indiana, has announced his intention of making an endeavor, at the next session of congress, to secure an increase in the postal rates on second class matter. The gentleman seems to be laboring under the impression that the inability of the government to place the mail business on a self-sustaining basis is due to the low rate accorded legitimate publications. It would be interesting to know just how much the "franked" mail of Congressman Overstreet cost the government during the last year or so. He should start his reform nearer home. If it were possible to debar from the mails or collect postage on the hundreds of tons of "documents" and campaign literature, issued under the guise of extracts from the Congressional Record, that are now circulated free by means of the congressional frank, we might soon see the postal department self-sustaining. The Indianapolis News recently cited one instance in which hundreds of tons of practically worthless books were sent out under the congressional frank, and asserted that the loss in postage to the government in this case alone amounted to over $15,000. Again, it would be apropos to investigate some of the fat mail contracts now held by the railroads.

In the Good Old Days.

THE JOURNAL has at hand the files of The Printer from 1859 to 1864. The Printer was published at No. 1 Spruce street, New York. In the pages of the monthly are found many items which may be of interest to our oldtime members, and no less interesting to the younger generation. For instance, in the issue of October, 1859, the following item appears:

NEW TYPESETTING MACHINE.

Mr. Hattersley, a Manchester (Eng.) engineer, has invented a new type imposing machine, of which the English journals speak favorably. The machine includes a regular composing stick, and as the type approaches the end of the line a bell gives warning, the stick is detached with a touch, and the compositor spaces the line, returns the stick and resumes his rapid task. The instrument works by the pressing of keys, which, through levers, discharge the types as wanted down grooves direct into the stick.—Ex.

And appended to the clipping is the following comment by the editor of The Printer:

Very good—very good, indeed, but we are inclined to think the estimate over sanguine. We boldly venture the assertion that, UNTIL MACHINES CAN BE MADE TO THINK, and at the same time adjust themselves to different sized fonts of type, the advertisements with two-line letters, cuts, display lines, italics, etc., and the various other kinds of matter, will never be set by them to any advantage. However, "we shall see what we shall see!"

In those days New York Typographical Union held its meetings on the first Saturday evening in the month, at 163 Bowery. The officers were: C. W. Colburn, president; B. L. Glasby, vice-president; R. D. Dack, recording secretary; W. F. Beers, corresponding secretary; G. A. Colburn, financial secretary; Samuel Sloan, treasurer; W. B. McManus, fund trustee; H. C. Maxwell, janitor.

The report of the meeting of March 5, 1859, as given in The Printer, is as follows:

At the monthly meeting of March 5 a vast amount of important business was transacted, embracing the reception of the report of a committee on a revised constitution and by-laws for the government of members, the admission of a large number of new members and the reinstatement of several old ones who had fallen in arrears. The receipts for dues, etc., for the past three months, ending March 29, amount to $410. This society, we believe, has about 900 enrolled members, of which number, some are passive, others active. The terms of membership are, to all qualified printers, $1 initiation fee, and payment of dues amounting to 6 cents weekly, a regular compliance with the latter condition alone conferring active or full membership.

Pledge Financial Support.

The following resolutions were passed at the recent meeting of the Maine State Federation of Labor at Bangor:

Whereas, The International Typographical Union has declared for an eight-hour workday, to take effect on January 1, 1906, and

Whereas, The American Federation of Labor, at their convention in San Francisco, Cal., unanimously voted "moral and financial support" to the International Typographical Union, and also appointed a committee to co-operate with the International Typographical Union officers and committee in securing eight hours; therefore, be it

Resolved, That this Maine State Federation of Labor hereby endorses the movement of the International Typographical Union for an eight-hour workday; and, be it further

Resolved, That the Maine State Federation of Labor hereby pledges its moral and financial support in furthering the movement for eight hours that means so much for our printers, and also for the workingmen at large throughout our country; and be it further

Resolved, That the executive board of the Maine State Federation of Labor be empowered to act as a committee to aid the representatives of the International Typographical Union in the state of Maine.

The Publishers Held Up.

In connection with the publication by several newspapers of the screeds entitled "The Common People," "You Are Your Brother's Keeper," and "There's a Reason," the following correspondence, furnished by a publisher who refused to be coerced by the Post threatened boycott, will be of interest:

July 7, 1905.

To Publisher:

Your attention is invited to the inclosed from Mr. Post. He has in the past withheld some heavy display advertisements from papers too much under the domination of labor trusts to print his announcements seeking the emancipation of the people.

Experience proves that mediums which cater most to the relatively small number of labor union readers are not sought by the great buying public, and therefore not profitable for the advertiser of high grade goods.

Please do not run any of the inclosed articles if you do not care to comply with the request to run the article, "The Common People," free, in the interest of yourselves, your people, and your city.

Mr. Post is not asking anything for himself, he asks it for you.

Yours truly,
GRANDIN ADVERTISING AGENCY, LTD.

July 7, 1905.

To Publisher:

Time was when some newspapers feared to print news criticizing outlawry by labor unions and sunk to a deplorable condition of servility.

It has been discovered that about 780 citizens in 800 are not members of unions, and that the paper which stands fearlessly for the 780 wields the influence, secures the readers, and makes life worth living again for the publisher.

I have instructed the Grandin Agency to send you two large display articles, "There's a Reason" and "You Are Your Brother's Keeper," to be run on our special display rate.

Inclosed with the above is an article of pure news, "The Common People," a talk to your citizens about their power when organized, urging them to organize for defense against all forms of trust tyranny.

The subject is of such importance to the publisher in his own business, to every citizen and to the city itself that I feel free to request that this article find space in your paper without charge, as outlined in directions which will govern, as given by the agency.

A strong citizens' association, voicing public opinion through organization, proves, by actual experience, to be about the 'most loosening thing' yet discovered for the bands about publishers and other common people.

Respectfully yours,
C. W. POST.

IN this issue of THE JOURNAL is included a picture of the buildings and grounds of the Union Printers' Home. This is the first drawing ever made on such a comprehensive scale, and gives a good idea of the beauty and magnitude of our institution. This picture should prove a valuable adjunct to the work of organization. Show it to the non-union printer. It may make him think. It may be well to state here that the automobile depicted in the halftone is not the property of any of the residents or officers of the Home.

AT the request of the Order of Railway Telegraphers, the American Federation of Labor has placed the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway on the unfair list.

Lese Majeste.

The Fort Wayne (Ind.) News takes a fling at D. M. Parry in the following diplomatic language:

D. M. Parry has been re-elected president of the National Association of Manufacturers, an action which would indicate that the members of the organization are in sympathy with his rather radical views. While Mr. Parry has been right in denouncing bad men who have risen to power in the world of union labor and in criticising the bad breaks which have been made by individual unions, he has never advanced a proper argument against unionism as a principle. The fact that individual men or organizations may abuse a power committed to their hands is no reason for condemning such a power as an evil. The unions may contain bad men who may rise to the dignity of leadership, but so, for that matter, may the Christian churches. Indeed, if it be not lèse majesté to say it, a far stretch of the imagination may carry us even to the point where we can conceive of the National Association of Manufacturers being officered by prejudiced, unreasoning and selfish men.

THE JOURNAL does not believe that the imagination will be damaged to any great extent by stretching it in the manner the News suggests. In fact, a great amount of imagination is not needed to arrive at the conclusion reached.

CHICAGO UNION No. 16 has extended a cordial invitation to all delegates and visitors who may pass through that city on their way to Toronto to stop off on August 10, the Thursday preceding the opening of the convention, and partake of the far-famed hospitality of No. 16. Arrangements have been made for an automobile ride around the city, and other forms of entertainment are being arranged. It would be well for all who intend stopping over to so inform the president of the Chicago Ex-Delegates' Society, L. A. Hornstein, or the secretary, John McGowan, 192 N. State street, Chicago.

THE LABOR CLARION, the official journal of the San Francisco Labor Council, is doing yeoman service for the printers of that city in presenting their side of the present controversy.

EIGHT hours for work, eight hours for sleep, eight hours to do as we will.

THE National Editorial Association, at its recent meeting in Oklahoma, adopted resolutions supporting the book and job employers in their stand against the eight-hour day. This is rather surprising, as it is a well known fact that the leading newspapers of the country are, and have been for some time, working under the shorter hours. It must be taken into consideration that the members attending the convention were hardly a representative body of publishers, very few of the leading papers of the country being represented. Perhaps the resolutions were railroaded through in the same manner as they were at the National Manufacturers' Association meeting.

THE Trades and Labor Assembly of Denver, Colo., is sending to the various labor bodies of that state a copy of proposed amendments to the state constitution that would prevent the usurpation of the powers of the courts by the governor and military. In view of conditions that have prevailed in the state of Colorado in times past, the wisdom of the proposed amendments will be readily seen. The trades and labor assembly urges the labor bodies of the state to express their approval of the amendments and exert all their power to have the general assembly present them to the people for popular vote.

THROUGH an error in making up the list of delegates for last month's JOURNAL, the names of a delegate and an alternate were transposed in the St. Paul list. The returns from that city should read: Delegates—John Klaus, John J. Cahill. Alternates—George Armstrong, William Templeman. Joseph R. Buchanan was listed under the head of "Irregularly Elected" delegates, as from Boston. He will represent New York Newspaper Writers No. 5. For all of which THE JOURNAL most humbly begs pardon.

CHILD labor is a disgrace. Help to crush it out by shunning non-union products and by demanding the union label. Don't save a few cents on scab goods which represent the life blood wrung from little children.—Terra Cotta Worker's Journal.

What We Are Doing

Eight Hours was secured by Paterson (N. J.) Union No. 195 on July 1. The secretary writes that there was no friction whatever.

Eight Hours on the first of next January is called for in the contracts which Tucson (Ariz.) Union No. 465 just signed with the employers of that city.

Eight Hours on January 1, 1906. This clause is incorporated in the contracts which Butler (Pa.) Union No. 415 just signed with all the employers of that town.

Eight Hours will take effect in Shelbyville, Ind., on January 1, 1906. Contracts have just been forwarded to headquarters in which the proprietors agree to the shorter workday on the date set by the International Typographical Union.

Eight Hours was secured by Pittsburg (Kan.) Union No. 470 on July 8. Secretary Graves writes THE JOURNAL that the union had no trouble whatever in securing the shorter workday, and that the best of relations exist between employers and employes.

Eight Hours shall constitute a day's work in all offices under the jurisdiction of Missoula (Mont.) Typographical Union No. 277. That's the way the contracts read that were forwarded to International headquarters. The shorter workday went into effect on July 3.

Eight Hours still prevails in the union offices of San Francisco. Sixteen establishments locked out their union employes and were unable to do any business, the few men they were able to import proving incompetent. The offices were closed—not a wheel turning nor a line of type being set. The United Typothetæ of America directed all its efforts to get them in operation. John Macintyre was on the scene. Eighty-eight offices decided to continue fair, and work but eight hours. As THE JOURNAL goes to press word comes that the lockout has been broken, the largest firm on the coast signing an eight-hour contract for two years. The San Francisco correspondent gives an account of the situation in another column.

Eight Hours on the date set by the International, is the word that comes from Pontiac (Mich.) Union No. 512. The contracts sent to headquarters by that union are for a year and a half from July 1, the eight-hour clause to take effect on the first of next January.

Eight Hours, beginning on the first of next January, for Lake Charles (La.) Union No. 568, is specified in the contracts just signed by that union. The following gradual reduction to the eight-hour day is provided for: From July 8, 1905, to October 1, 1905, eight and one-half hours; from October 1, 1905, to January 1, 1906, eight and one-fourth hours, and eight hours thereafter.

Eight Hours is provided for on January 1, 1906, in contracts just signed by two offices in Indianapolis. The secretary of No. 1 states that but little difficulty will be encountered in establishing the shorter workday. Several of the largest offices in the city have announced that they will concede the eight-hour day rather than have trouble. The fact that Indianapolis is the headquarters for a large number of international unions, which have their printing done in the city, guarantees that the little joker will carry the shorter workday to victory.

ANOTHER nail was driven in the nine-hour coffin in Indianapolis this month. The contract for printing the official paper of the Modern Woodmen was secured by the Pratt printing firm, of the Hoosier capital. The cost of printing the publication is about $70,000 a year—and the use of the label is ordered in the contract.

SPARTANBURG (S. C.) UNION No. 341 signed a scale on July 3 with every employer in the town (six in number) which is highly satisfactory to all concerned. The contracts run until December 31. The secretary of No. 341 writes THE JOURNAL that the scale was at first made to include the eight-hour day, and to run for one year. But some of the employers seemed to think that the Toronto convention would modify or change the eight-hour law, so the nine-hour day was inserted and the contracts made to run to December 31. When the proprietors see that we mean EIGHT HOURS, says the secretary, they will readily sign for the shorter workday.

A NEW scale went into effect for Fresno (Cal.) Union No. 144 on June 1, by the provisions of which machine men receive an increase of 25 cents per day and floor men an increase of 50 cents per day. Job printers received an increase of $1 per week, which now makes their scale $19 per week. Fresno is an EIGHT-HOUR town.

Indorsing Political Candidates.

HAVE WE AN OBJECT IN VIEW?

I am against labor unions mixing into politics, unless there is something of interest which may bring good results, such as the union label on text books, and the Boston Allied Printing Trades Council has, each year, requested each and every candidate for the school board to pledge himself in favor of the label appearing on school books. In the majority of these cases the candidates were in favor. This is the most interesting question now being considered in Boston, and a hearing was given by the committee on text books some months ago, but as yet no report has been made. It is the earnest intention of the council to watch the movements of this committee, and if some consideration is not given the label when they report, organized labor of Boston will be compelled to work against the members of this committee when they come around again for election to the Boston school board. In an editorial printed some time ago by Hearst's Boston American, organized labor was advised to take part in politics, and interesting points were produced at that time showing the great value of labor unions in politics. During the fall of 1892, when a certain publisher of a Boston daily newspaper was running for congress on the republican ticket, he was defeated by the democratic candidate, through the medium of the Boston Newspaper Mailers' Union; for this same publisher refused to recognize the union, and a very active committee of the union appeared before all the labor unions in the district and spoke night after night against the desire of this publisher not to recognize the mailers, and the campaign laid out by this committee was in a very large part responsible for the defeat of the republican candidate. This was one of the times when labor unions, by taking part in politics, helped to do a good work for a sister organization, the mailers, and only a short time afterward an agreement was entered into, and both the paper and the mailers benefited. So the only time, in my opinion, that labor unions should mix in politics, is when their interests are concerned.

There are controversies arising, from time to time, of the legality of unions endorsing political candidates, and in Boston some unions do endorse politicians, but these organizations are connected with city work. A row happened some time ago here, when a member of a labor union appeared on the stump and made a political speech. He was billed from a certain union. This case was investigated, and he, not having the authority to use the name of the union, was censured and fined. As a general rule, labor unions in Boston are very cautious when they are asked to endorse political candidates. ROBERT T. ALLEN.

Boston, Mass.

USE YOUR BALLOT.

If a man offers as a candidate for public office, who has proven himself a friend of organized labor, it is the duty of labor to not only endorse him, but to work for his election, irrespective of party affiliation. Politicians recognize this principle by scheming to split the labor vote by putting one or more union men or union sympathizers on local tickets. While most of the unions are prohibited by their laws from taking political action officially, it would be well for them to hold conferences after the adjournment of their regular meetings and discuss the action they should take in impending elections. Politicians have a wholesome respect for the labor vote, but they defeat us by keeping us politically divided against ourselves. The trade unionist who is heartily in the struggle for industrial emancipation must know no party, no creed, but have an eye single to the main purpose. J. J. DIRKS.

President's Paragraphs

SECTION 131, GENERAL LAWS.

No local union shall sign a contract guaranteeing its members to work for any proprietor, firm or corporation, unless such contract is in accordance with International law and approved by the International President.

THE SAN FRANCISCO LOCKOUT.

The book and job contract between San Francisco Typographical Union No. 21 and the commercial printing houses expired on July 2. Prior to that date the firms presented a demand to the typographical, pressmen's and feeders' unions for the nine-hour day as against the eight-hour day, the latter effective under the expiring contract. The unions refused to accede to the demand, and reaffirmed allegiance to the standard workday and their determination to maintain it. A lockout resulted. It was not unanimously entered into by the employers by any means. Sixteen offices that had been working under union conditions posted nine-hour notices, while eighty-seven union firms continued with eight-hour offices. Shortly after the lockout, one firm, employing two printers and two pressmen, abandoned the nine-hour combination and returned to the eight-hour fold. The secretary of the United Typothetæ was early on the ground, and it appears was placed in charge of the lockout by the employers. After strenuous effort, about thirty non-unionists were obtained, the greater part of the number from the east. As about half of the "independent workmen" deserted the employers soon after arriving in San Francisco, and as 160 union printers—the copyholders, apprentices, etc., swelling the total to 200—were out, the fifteen or sixteen alleged printers did not go far toward filling the gap. Organizer Bonnington is representing the International Typographical Union, and as this paragraph was being written the following message was received:

"James M. Lynch, Newton Claypool Building, Indianapolis, Ind.:

"SAN FRANCISCO, July 22, 1905.

"Crocker, largest house in town, returns to eight hours and former conditions in every respect, under two-year contract, Monday.

"F. J. BONNINGTON."

The Crocker establishment employs about forty-five union printers.

"We stop the press" and make room for the very latest:

SAN FRANCISCO, July 26, 1905.

"James M. Lynch, Newton Claypool Building, Indianapolis, Ind.:

"Have held three conferences. Typothetæ willing to give hours and wages, but desire of some members for open shop delays settlement. Typothetæ claims can not make contract involving eight hours. We will insist upon individual agreements to run union shops. F. J. BONNINGTON."

NOW, PRESIDENT HIGGINS, MAKE GOOD.

The pressmen met in convention in San Francisco in June. As the book and job lockout was then in sight, President Higgins remained, after the convention adjourned, to look after the interests of the pressmen and feeders. It will be recalled that the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union has a contract with the United Typothetæ of America, providing for the nine-hour day to be in effect until May 1, 1907. The typothetæ secretary demanded of the pressmen's international president, under the contract referred to, that he order the pressmen and feeders back to work, nine hours per day. President Higgins refused, and in his letter said: "The executive board of the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union have carefully gone over the situation in San Francisco, and your connection therewith, relative to the pending controversy concerning the eight-hour day, and have come to the conclusion that you, as secretary of the United Typothetæ of America, have been guilty of gross violation of the contract and understanding existing between the United Typothetæ of America and the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union." It is then pointed out that the eight-hour day was voluntarily ceded to the pressmen by the San Francisco Typothetæ, and that it "remained in force with the consent and approval of the United Typothetæ of America." The typothetæ secretary was told the contention that the local contract provided that at a given time it should be merged into the national contract was without warrant, and that "the executive board fully believes that the strained construction which you are attempting to place upon that clause would never have been suggested but for the influence of an outside organization, established for the destruction of labor unions. Your suggestion that this clause of itself terminated the local agreement on July 1, 1905, and destroyed all rights of the local pressmen's union, is so strained and unreasonable as to be strongly suggestive of bad faith."

GET IN LINE FOR THE EIGHT-HOUR DAY,

Then the international president of the pressmen proceeded to make a few things plain to the typothetæ secretary, to wit: "The action and attitude of the United Typothetæ of America, as represented by you in San Francisco, and as its position is evidenced by your conduct in this matter, is extremely distasteful to the executive board of the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union, because it is believed, upon what seems to be sufficient and satisfactory evidence, that the United Typothetæ of America is interfering in a contest not its own, but in a contest brought on by a combination of certain members of the local typothetæ with the citizens' alliance of San Francisco to disrupt the local printing pressmen's union. This is contrary to the true spirit of the relations heretofore existing between the two national organizations, and is lacking in the essential element of mutual confidence which is a necessary condition precedent to the amicable adjustment of the relations between the employers and employes represented by us, respectively. A relation of equity is impossible where frankness, honor and good faith are lacking, as we believe them to be lacking on your part in this controversy. I therefore, on behalf of the executive board, beg to inform you that they regard the action of the United Typothetæ of America, as represented by your conduct in this matter, with horror and disgust; as a juggling attempt to use the national agreement for a purpose for which it was never intended—for which we know it was never intended, and for which you know it was never intended. If this course is persisted in by you, as the authorized representative of the United Typothetæ of America, we will be strongly inclined to consider the national contract violated in its legal aspect, as it has been most grossly violated in its equitable and honorable aspects already in San Francisco. We will not deal in these matters with the citizens' alliance, nor with its representatives, nor with its tools nor agents in the United Typothetæ. You understand the meaning of this. We will not hold ourselves bound by agreement which is not honorably observed by the United Typothetæ in its spirit as well as in its letter.

AND ADVISE YOUR UNIONS, AS YOU THREATENED.

"We will not permit the United Typothetæ of America to juggle with that contract, or, under the pretense put forward by you, to attempt to use it for the oppression of the local printing pressmen's union of San Francisco. We will be forced, therefore, if you persist in supporting the present lockout and giving it the sanction and moral support of the United Typothetæ, contrary to equity and honor and justice, to advise the printing pressmen and assistants' union throughout the United States and Canada that the conduct of the United Typothetæ with respect to the national contract is not characterized by good faith, and let the pressmen and assistants' unions determine whether or not they desire to be bound by contract to such a national body of employing printers. The national agreement will not be recognized as extending to nor binding upon the Pressmen's Union No. 24, of San Francisco. That question is no longer open to discussion. You have interfered without warrant in the relations between the San Francisco Typothetæ and the pressmen's union of San Francisco to the disturbance of their industrial relations in a matter wholly governed by their local contract, made and maintained for two years and over by the consent and sanction of our national organizations. Persistence in this course by the United Typothetæ, through you, is not conducive to the industrial peace, and may result in opening a breach which your complete withdrawal from the controversy might avoid." You now understand, President Higgins, that the United Typothetæ has no more love for your union than it has for any other union. "Advise the printing pressmen and assistants' unions throughout the United States and Canada that the conduct of the United Typothetæ with respect to the national contract is not characterized by good faith, and let the pressmen and assistants' unions determine whether or not they desire to be bound by contract to such a national body of employing printers." Then when these unions have taken negative action, let them get in line for the eight-hour day.

TIME OFF VERSUS REPRODUCTION.

Chicago Typographical Union No. 16 has negotiated a new contract with the Evening American and Morning Examiner. As to the importation of magazine sections from New York, the following provision will be of interest: "It is further agreed that the party of the first part agreeing to grant its employes certain favorable conditions, that the provisions of section 136, International Typographical Union general laws, shall not be construed in such a manner as to affect the use of matrices of news or miscellaneous parts of the New York Journal and Advertiser and the New York Evening Journal (other than ads and local news), and to avoid the possibility of any misconstruction it is mutually agreed and understood that the party of the first part shall have the privilege of using complete printed Sunday sections published by the New York Journal and Advertiser and the New York Evening Journal, or electrotype or stereotype plates therefor, and ship to Chicago; provided, however, that all such sections, matrices or portions of sections or matrices or plates shall be produced by union labor" under the jurisdiction of the various international unions in the printing trade, and "It being expressly understood and agreed, by and between the American and Examiner and Chicago Typographical Union No. 16, that the difference in time as between the seven-hour day and the eight-hour day, and the difference in compensation as between 55 cents and 64 2-7 cents per hour for day work and 60 cents and 71 3-7 cents per hour for night work, and other differences in scales on Chicago daily newspapers shall be deemed the just consideration agreed on by and between the parties hereto, whereby Chicago Typographical Union No. 16 relinquishes all claims to composition exclusive of advertisements in the Sunday supplement to Hearst's Chicago American and Examiner." The scale provides that "the standard day and night shall consist of seven and one-half continuous hours, including thirty minutes for lunch; provided, however, that the standard time of those starting between 12 midnight and 6 A. M. shall consist of seven hours, including thirty minutes for lunch." The scale is $27 per week of six days, and $30 per week of six nights; overtime, price and one-half.

THE COUNTRY EMPLOYER AND EIGHT HOURS.

The secretary of the Twin City joint eight-hour committee circulated the following letter among country publishers: "No doubt you will be surprised to receive this letter, but we have been instructed to communicate with you and ask your co-operation in our endeavor to keep pace with the demands of civilization in the matter of hours of labor. And we feel from our knowledge of the weekly editor—the molder of thought in his community—that you will give our undertaking your hearty support. As you probably know, the International Typographical Union has designated January 1, 1906, as the date on which the eight-hour day shall become effective in the book and job branch of the printing trades in all cities under its jurisdiction. There is nothing unreasonable in this demand, when city conditions, as pertains to the health and longevity of the urban printer, are considered. As you are also no doubt aware, our International officers have made repeated efforts to amicably adjust this shorter workday with the United Typothetæ of America, but all efforts toward conciliation have been stubbornly resisted by that organization. We feel that were the relations existing in the cities between proprietor and workman as close as it is in smaller places the necessity for unions would hardly exist. The country editor always seems ready to divide equitably with his help and further their mutual interests, but in the city the factory rule prevails—a man is a numbered part of a machine—in fact gets less consideration, as the employer never thinks of giving him a little extra oil or sees that repairs are maintained—so we have to band together to procure equitable remuneration, reasonable hours of labor and sanitary workshops. We are led to believe that the commercial printers of this district expect to entice your employes to the cities in case of a disagreement on January 1, 1906. In the past we have always gladly put forth our best endeavor to send you competent help when called upon, and in doing so have felt we were helping ourselves at the same time. Now we hope that your philanthropic character will be manifested in this matter and discourage your young friends and employes from coming to the Twin Cities in case we are crowded up against the last resort. You know the ignominy that attaches to a man who wittingly takes the position of one who is asserting his manhood and making a sacrifice that civilization may move forward and make the conditions of mankind better—then impress it on the boys and save them from making this mistake." One recipient replied thusly: "I want to say at the outset that I am not in sympathy with your movement for shorter hours. I put in twelve hours a day myself, and if a man is not willing to work nine hours he is lazy and deserves to lose his job, and have his place taken by some one who is more industrious. I hate unions of all kinds."

WILL NOT JOIN THE TYPOTHETAE.

Commenting on the secretary's letter, the Hayfield Guard, a suburban weekly, says: "The employing job printers of the Twin Cities are sending out circulars asking country publishers to join the Northwestern Master Printers' Association and incidentally trying to hold them up for $2 per year and $1 application fee. This association is formed by the employing printers of the Twin Cities, who have been asked by their typesetters for an eight-hour day on January 1, next. This modest little request carries with it no good reason why we should part with hard-earned dollars. On the contrary, one can read between the lines and see where he is pulling the trigger with the barrel aimed directly at himself. Why are the city proprietors so solicitous for us just at this particular time? This association was not formed before the typographical union asked for the eight-hour day. The city printers expect to have a strike, and want country printers to take the place of the strikers, and want us to pay part of their railroad fare with our $3. When our printers go to the cities we will be short. We can't send to the cities and get high-priced men. Our experience has been that the average country printer, when he has mastered the trade and is a good, fast workman, will go to the cities and remain. We will not join this association, and as for contributing to the fight fund—if you hadn't sent agents into our territory and taken a good part of our job printing business, we might have had the price to help you along. But, judging from the way they have raised the prices on state printing this year (an increase of over 60 per cent) they should not need country contributions."

EIGHT HOURS IN OTHER OCCUPATIONS.

The July report of the department of labor of the state of New York says that while the bakers, in their trade unions, are now struggling to maintain the ten-hour day first established by legislation, workmen in other trades are enjoying the nine-hour day and are now moving toward the eight-hour day. Relatively few mechanics in the building trades work more than eight hours a day, and in the building industry of New York city the forty-four-hour week is almost universal. Within the last few years the printers have reduced the daily working hours from ten to nine and are now moving rapidly toward eight hours. "The impetus toward reduction came through the introduction of typesetting machines, which enabled the workmen to maintain production while working a shorter time. Very few printers, either machine operators or hand compositors, employed in daily newspaper offices now work more than eight hours a day, and the eight-hour day has been introduced in a great many weekly newspaper and book and job offices."

NOTES.

A general strike of about 50,000 housesmiths all over the country against the employers' association, the National Association of Erectors of Structural Steel and Iron, has been averted. The employers recently refused a demand for the renewal of the last agreement. It was then decided to order a strike, and one was called in some cities, but at the last minute a conference was held between the representatives of the employers and of the union, at which the agreement was renewed. The president of the structural ironworkers says: "The structural ironworkers had been getting $4.50 a day for eight hours for the last two years, and only demanded the renewal of the agreement."

Even an eight-hour day was excessive during the July hot weather. It will be just as warm, or warmer, again this summer—and next summer. So, redouble your efforts to secure the shorter workday.

We approach our eight-hour mass meeting in Toronto, the greatest thus far, and Now uncork the eight-hour enthusiasm!

Woman's Department

WOMAN'S INTERNATIONAL AUXILIARY.

President—Mrs. Frank A. Kennedy, 2603 North Twentieth street, Omaha, Neb.

Secretary—Mrs. Ed D. Donnell, 906 West Eighth street, Cincinnati, Ohio.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.

The regular meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary No. 5, held on July 3, was graced by the presence of Mrs. Ed Donnell, our International secretary, who made several interesting remarks, which were well received by those present.

Mrs. C. E. McKee entertained for Mrs. Donnell on the afternoon of July 4, and a very enjoyable time was had.

A lawn social is being contemplated, and bids fair to be a success, the weather permitting. The proceeds are to be used to help defray the expenses of our delegate to the convention. Some of the ladies are looking forward to the trip to Toronto, and it is very likely that quite a good many will take advantage of the opportunity offered by the Typographical special.

The membership of No. 5 is increasing slowly. Rarely a meeting is held but that one or more applications are received. Still there is room for improvement, and we are hoping for the time when more of the ladies will become interested in our auxiliary and enroll themselves as members.

MRS. R. HENNING.

TORONTO, CANADA.

Toronto Woman's Auxiliary to Typographical Union held its June meeting in the Labor Temple, at which two new members were received, and considerable business transacted.

Representatives from the bakers' union were present and supplied each member with a card on which was printed the names of about twenty bakeries that were on the fair list, asking the members of the auxiliary to patronize the union bakeries only. It also contained the names of three bakeshops (Messrs. Breedin, Weston and Tomlin) where there is a strike on at present, asking the members to assist them in their fight against these three unfair firms. The members of the auxiliary will assist the bakers' union as far as lies in their power by patronizing only fair bakers, and would request the wives of the members of Typographical Union No. 91 to stop taking bread from the unfair firms until they have settled their trouble with the bakers' union.

During the past month the members of No. 42 held two very successful basket picnics, one at Victoria Park, on June 27, at which about 40 were present, and the second one at Island Park, on Saturday, July 15, at which about 80 people sat down to supper. The committee in charge received the hearty thanks of every one present for the very enjoyable time.

During the past month Mrs. Hunter, vice-president of No. 42, resigned her office, on account of leaving the city, Mr. Hunter having purchased a newspaper at Kincardine, Ont. While it is with regret that the members of No. 42 received the resignation, they all join in wishing both Mr. and Mrs. Hunter success and prosperity in their new field.

I would advise all delegates to the Woman's International Auxiliary and visitors to the convention to come by way of Niagara Falls, and to be in Toronto, if possible, on Saturday night, as No. 42 will hold a reception in the parlors of the Rossin House on that evening.

MRS. H. STEVENSON.

OMAHA, NEB.

The time now draws near when we shall again meet to interchange ideas and formulate plans to perfect and maintain our organization and render such help as within us lies to advance the objects and aims of the typographical union and organized labor generally.

Never before in the life of our organization, it seems to me, was woman's influence and work as necessary as it now is, or would be more effective if properly directed in opposing Parry-Postism by pushing the label to the front and "hiring union labor ourselves by purchasing union-made products."

The Omaha Label League has conceived a plan to make the carrying out of the above object quite easy and effective, and should the scheme be adopted I hope to place it before the auxiliary convention for its consideration and propagation throughout our entire organization.

There seems to be a desire to "finance" the International auxiliary, but my own impression is that it does not need much financing and that as little of this be done as possible, seeing that our finance for all purposes indirectly comes from the same source—the printers' muscles and pocket, and should therefore not be drawn upon too heavily.

To make it plain: I am opposed to any assessments and am in favor of the auxiliaries being run on a per capita tax of 40 cents per year. What the auxiliary needs is members, not money. If the tax is made 40 cents the burden will be just one-half as heavy on the thousand pioneers as it is now, and the national officers can be depended upon to keep the expenses within the receipts. At 40 cents per capita the revenue on one thousand members is $400 per year; on two thousand members, $800 per year; on four thousand members it is $1,600 per year; on five thousand members it is $2,000 per year. Let us make the per capita tax 40 cents and our "goal" five thousand members.

Local auxiliaries seem to have no difficulty (at least such as have come under my observation) in raising the necessary funds to meet their expenses by holding social entertainments and reunions, which have a very beneficial effect on the trade outside their profit in a financial sense to the auxiliary. There seems to be a disposition to amend our constitution by the enactment of additional laws, and this is a direction in which I think we should be slow to move.

A multiplicity of laws neglected or ignored often creates confusion and doubt in the minds of the membership with regard to their application and force, and gives grounds for wrangling and differences of opinion as to their interpretation. We may need additional laws or we may not, but my own opinion is that for an organization like ours a few general laws well understood and strictly observed are less cumbersome and more practical than to be loaded down with a constitution which few take time to study and commit to memory and is therefore useless.

When we have few laws there will be no conflicting ones, and the history of government is replete with examples of this evil.

"Our friends the enemy," the enemies of the union label in this section, are becoming more reconciled to its use in proportion to the demand for it, and under the new scheme I expect to see launched, woman, as the purchasing agent for the household, will possess greater power than she has wielded heretofore. I will now close this screed, hoping to meet your representatives and share with them in the hospitality of our good friends of Toronto.

MRS. FRANK A. KENNEDY.

ST. LOUIS, MO.

Eight hours for work, eight hours for sleep, and eight hours for recreation.

The euchre given at Delmar garden on July 6, by No. 29, was greatly enjoyed by those present. The beautiful resort afforded delightful surroundings for al fresco entertainment. The prizes were captured by Mrs. Busse, Mrs. DeLay and the writer.

The apathy referred to by Mrs. Brady as existing in Baltimore is prevalent in St. Louis to some extent also, and doubtless elsewhere. It is well understood, of course, that all organizations which are of a purely auxiliary character, or whose purpose is not to enforce a scale of wages or some such vital principle, have greater fluctuation in membership and interest. But it would seem, in the case of the Woman's Auxiliary of the International Typographical Union, that if the female dependents upon the union printers would take the pains to analyze their position and duty in this regard, the auxiliary would have nearer 25,000 members than the meager 1,046. Don't wait till trouble overtakes you to get interested. Begin now. In time of peace prepare for war. Some one has said that if union people were as particular as to how they spend their money as they are as to the earning of it, they could enforce all reasonable demands. A punster, when asked if he believed women should receive men's wages, said it was popularly believed that the married ones did! Now the application is simple enough: Demand the label.

MRS. J. J. DIRKS.

CHICAGO, ILL.

At the last meeting of Auxiliary No. 41, our delegate to the International was instructed to bring before the convention a proposition looking to the establishment of a death benefit, to be put into effect, by each auxiliary forwarding one dollar for each member of six months' standing.

Also, that the International law be amended to allow of greater liberty in taking members, and that an honorable withdrawal card entitle the holder's relatives to membership, that near relatives of a printer who unfortunately marry outside of the craft be not barred, but that this be left to the discretion of the local auxiliary. I trust that the delegates will think these matters over seriously, so as to at least start the ball rolling.

We are indebted to Mrs. Venus Heath for many suggestions for the good and welfare of the auxiliary. She says she sees visions of the great good the Woman's International Auxiliary is going to accomplish in the future. Let us help make her dreams come true. I trust the fortunate ones will have a fine time at the convention, and that the weather man will be gracious enough to furnish a brand of weather of which he will not be ashamed.

MRS. GILBERT R. JONES.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.

The Mountain City Woman's Auxiliary No. 21 met, July 6, with Mrs. J. R. Kemp, in her beautiful suburban home. After the regular transaction of business was over Mrs. Kemp served cake and cream, and was assisted by her mother, Mrs. Kemp.

Am glad to state that the S. H. Kress five and ten cent store is again on the fair list. All ladies will be pleased to know this, as Kress's is a very pretty and popular store here.

No. 21 is feeling very blue these days, as our president, Mrs. Ed Hale, has been very ill, and for a few days her recovery was doubtful, but at this writing she is much improved. Our ever-faithful vice-president, Mrs. E. J. Rhine, has been very unfortunate to be confined to her bed, and that in a hospital, these hot July days, and again she is fortunate to be doing so nicely after having such a critical operation performed. Many of the ladies have been with her, hoping to shorten her stay there and cause her to forget her sufferings for a time. Lovely cut flowers brightened her room, the gift of No. 21. All are delighted to know how nicely these officers are getting along and hope they may continue.

This morning proves to me again that I am proud to be a printer's wife and auxiliary woman, when the postman handed me an invitation accompanied with a free ticket to see a minstrel show, July 21, at one of our popular parks. The ladies are all given box seats, and a pleasant evening is certain. In advance we thank No. 89 for the good time we are sure to have.

Mrs. W. H. Martin has returned from Florida, after residing there for some months. No. 21 hopes to see her at our next meeting. Mrs. Martin is a charter member and we welcome her as of old.

Mrs. A. G. Lynn, who was called home very unexpectedly some weeks ago to be with a sick father, has returned, leaving the father well. Glad to have her with us again.

The next meeting is on Monday, August 7, at the home of Mrs. John O'Brien, 111 B street. Mrs. O'Brien insists on all members being present and bringing a new member along.

MRS. OZA BLODGETT.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

It is some time since a letter from No. 18 appeared in the Woman's Department of the JOURNAL. I have been asked why this is the case. The only excuse I can offer is that No. 18 has appointed a very able press agent in the person of Will J. French, the worthy president of the San Francisco Typographical Union, who on several occasions has given mention to No. 18 in his San Francisco letter to THE JOURNAL. However, a few words in our proper department will not be amiss. No. 18, while not numerically strong, is firm in its principles for advancement of union interests. Its members are careful to buy only where the label is used and where union help is employed. Though they are few in number they do not confine their work to themselves, they do everything they can to make their influence felt by others by urging them to purchase only label goods. To succeed in a case of this kind means constant vigilance, but the cause warrants the labor. To keep the ball constantly rolling is the best means of advertising the cause, and as the cause is a just one, proper advertising will win interest and final success. The present agitation offers a fine opportunity for woman to use her tongue as a weapon of defense, and put the old adage to shame somewhat. The members are wearing the eight-hour buttons, so it is not necessary to state that they are firm for the label and eight-hour day and that they believe in the motto, "Live and let live."

ENDORSING POLITICAL CANDIDATES.

ENDORSE PRINCIPLES—NOT CANDIDATES.

The suggestion that correspondents take up the discussion of questions of importance to labor is an excellent idea. There is nothing the working people need so much at the present time as economic education. The concentration of many minds upon some phase of the labor problem will be of inestimable value to our membership and add a strong feature to THE JOURNAL. The first subject selected is, "Should Trade Unions Endorse Candidates for Public Office?" To assume that it would be a good or bad thing so to do, is to admit the truth of the claim so long denied by pure and simple trades unionists—that "the labor question is a political question." To accept this position now is proof, indeed, that we are progressing. The monopolist, bondholder, manufacturer, and business man, while sometimes masking their intentions under some smooth-sounding term, as "the public," "citizen," "taxpayer," etc., always and inevitably approach political questions from the point of view of their material interests. They recognize that, as owners of land and capital, they have special interests to serve within the government, and act together in passing and enforcing laws to that end. Why, then, should not the great mass of the people, whose only "property" is their labor power, do likewise? That they must do so is becoming more evident every day. But how can the interests of the producers be best served in a political way? Would the endorsement of different candidates upon the several party tickets accomplish this end? Here an individual republican—there a democrat—and yonder a socialist or prohibitionist? By all means, NO! Such a policy, if adopted by organized labor, could bring no real benefit to the working people, but, on the contrary, would do much to divide them and open wider the doors of graft to the self-seeking leader. The "union man on the ticket" would then be a regular bill on the program of the political machine, to muddle and divide the labor vote. But the main objection to this policy is its futility. The "endorsed" candidate, if elected, could not be expected to look after the interests of labor, for the simple reason that he is subject to the stronger control of the political party by which he is nominated. He might be permitted, merely for effect, to support some real or fancied labor measure; but only when it was preconceived that it never would become a law or else "killed" by the courts. His position upon all legislation that menaced the economic power of those who dominated the party whose servant he was, would be dictated by that party. For him to act contrary to its will would seal his political doom. As an illustration: About two years ago the prohibitionists of this state endorsed a candidate for attorney-general upon the democratic ticket. While all the other candidates of his party were defeated, he was elected with the aid of the prohibition vote. Now, upon the question of prohibiting the liquor trade, which is the chief aim of the "endorsing" party, the democratic party is decidedly opposed. This attorney-general, when put to the test, could not serve two hostile interests, and he quite naturally acted for the welfare of those who dominated his party. The prohibitionists gained nothing by this action; the only result being to make their movement ridiculous and to create the dissensions within their party which always follow fusion methods. In principle, this applies with greater force in matters of more economic importance than the liquor question. For trade unionists to adopt this method of trying to secure what they must do for themselves is the height of stupidity and folly. The capitalist political parties are alike opposed to all legislation which will grant labor its rights and freedom. And equally hopeless are the independent or reform movements that spring up from time to time. They are merely the expression of digruntled elements from the old parties, who can not agree upon any practical or revolutionary program. A party of any consequence must have such a platform, be thoroughly organized, and reflect the economic interests of a class powerful enough to bring it into power. It is only through the operation of this sort of political organization that the rights of labor will be secured. What the trade unions need at the present time is education of the rank and file. When once they see clearly, and know what they want, intelligent political action will follow. They will find their place in that party which voices their common hopes and aspirations—that reflects their material interests. Meanwhile, let us have open discussion in our meetings and through the trade journals; but let us see to it that our unions and our leaders, as such, are not committed to any political program. Let us "endorse" principles whenever we can collectively agree upon them, but never individual candidates—good, bad or indifferent—"friendly" or otherwise. HENRY D. HENDERSON.

Rochester, N. Y.

A MOMENTOUS QUESTION.

"Should the labor union go into politics?" is a momentous problem, and its solution is the task that now confronts the men who have at heart the welfare of the toiler. True, the same question has been up for discussion before, but never in the history of the trades union movement has it seemed so necessary of a wise solution as now. With the prevalent system of legislation and of law enforcement, which, to an alarming extent, fails to recognize the rights and prerogatives of the man without a bank book, the hour is at hand when trade unionists must decide whether they will sit supinely and see their rights ruthlessly trampled under foot or rise up in their might and demand some of the things now denied them, that are theirs by virtue of citizenship in "the land of the free and the home of the brave." Of course it is generally conceded that the introduction into the trade union of partisan politics would be an unwise move and would, if permitted to operate unchecked, eventually disrupt the organization. It is also generally known that this is not likely to happen while the present conservative spirit prevails in the management of the unions. But all are agreed that something must be done to bring the rank and file of politicians to a realization of the rights of the common people. The little gobs of sop (always lacking the flavor of sincerity) that have been ladled out to "the workingman" in the past, will no longer satisfy; something more tangible is now demanded. How are these things to be obtained? I have known one or two instances in which trade unionists saw the wisdom of laying aside partisanship and uniting in the support of a candidate in their own ranks, one pledged absolutely by his obligation to see that no wrong should come to them by any act of his, and that without necessarily curtailing the rights of any other class. In the cases referred to this plan has worked to the satisfaction of all, and thereby the organizations involved have been materially strengthened by reason of the prevailing harmony. To this extent the introduction of politics into trade unions can have but a beneficial result. The unbridled discussion of partisan politics would, however, be simply ruinous, and should never be permitted. J. B. NESBIT.

Des Moines, Iowa.

SHOULD KEEP OUT OF POLITICS.

Shall the union take an active part in politics? is a question that union men from the time of the inception of unionism have attempted to solve with more or less dissatisfactory results. That a great deal has been accomplished for the cause by so doing I am loath to admit. In many instances our weakness has been shown by attempting political action. I believe that it is the wisest policy for the trades union movement to keep aloof as far as possible from partisan politics. In a sense unionism is politics, and when it is strong enough the political questions inherent in it will take care of themselves without dividing the strength of the votaries of unionism. I heartily agree with the present announced policy of the International Typographical Union, the slogan of which is "Organize." Then, by careful and conservative management, we may acquire benefits to disseminate to the membership. These benefits are in the nature of increased wages and shorter hours. We should be prepared to disseminate these benefits nearly as fast as we are able to organize. If we can not we are sure to become topheavy, which begets dissatisfaction and unrest—dissatisfaction with the management of the union and unrest at its inability to make its benefits felt. Unionism is a weapon in itself, and it only divides its strength by entering politics. The main causes that have led union men to take an active part in behalf of unionism in a political way are the union label propaganda and the inordinate ambition of many of the leaders to gain political office. A too aggressive effort in behalf of the one and on the part of the other is equally disastrous for the cause of unionism. Unionism must depend for its security and perpetuity upon the intelligence and increased understanding of its membership on political questions and new methods of activity. It is not wise to drag unionism into the mire of politics until the sentiment is so nearly unanimous as to preclude a reaction. I grant you that on some occasions, where the issue has simmered down to one easily comprehended idea, that it is safe to enter politics, but these instances are rare. Here in Sioux City an open and avowed enemy of organized labor has been defeated for public office, but it was accomplished in a quiet way, and I believe the noiseless way is the most effective one. This one thing is certain, that as soon as the leaders of organized labor attempt to enter politics

they are discredited by their union constituents, and to discredit the leaders is equivalent to discrediting unionism in general. That is my main reason for discouraging all attempts to put unionism into politics. As long as there are efforts made to put unionism into politics just so long will there be those who will attempt to hitch it to their peculiar political hobbies. My advice is to keep an eye on the main chance of unionism. Let the individual enter and take an active part in politics as a private citizen. He will then place himself in the largest field of usefulness for the greatest activity in both movements. A. D. SCOUGAL.

YES AND NO.

Yes and no. However paradoxical this may be, it is the only way for labor organizations to eventually come into the full fruition of their labor. Many and varied are the arguments advanced, pro and con, upon a subject that contemplates the bringing of endorsements to any candidate for public office, even should he have the temerity and nerve to allow himself to stand upon platforms as enunciated by the various conditions governing local or national conditions. Take the first word beginning this paragraph, for instance. It has to do with the individual who is a known quantity to organized labor. By qualifying this statement it is meant to reflect the thought that the environments of some men in their social and business life are such that would necessarily of themselves bar any organization, especially those organizations having to do with labor. A man who has not been forced to associate with the out and out labor union individuals can, as a general rule, have but little sympathy with their aims and objects. Of course, there are exceptions, but they would be few and far between. When a man presents himself before the public for their suffrage in public office, and that man is known by his past utterances and actions to be broad-minded and the tool of no corporate influences, it is far safer to place the stamp of approval upon such a man than not at all. Supposing, by way of illustration, that a member of a local labor organization allowed the political bee to buzz to such an extent that he at length entered the arena against any and all comers. His record as a man of integrity, honesty of purpose, ability and broad-mindedness should by all means be endorsed by all the labor organizations of his locality. Should there be more than one aspirant for the same office with practically the same qualifications, let them settle between themselves, which one shall withdraw, and if this fails, have resort to a secret ballot, where the convictions of each voter may find free expression.

The cry has long gone forth that it is high time that labor should have its representatives in the various legislative, executive and administrative bodies. This cry would soon cease should labor organizations endorse, and after they had endorsed, bear in mind that their endorsement would not be sufficient to elect unless backed up by action. Again it has been said that political and sectarian action of any kind would bring about the dethronement of labor organizations. I am not the one to idly cry for a chance to see whether it would or no. There is a vast deal of difference between sectarian and political ethics. As a rule the latter does not assist in increasing and bettering the conditions under which labor exists, while politics and parties make and almost unmake some of the strongest labor organizations. A man at the helm who thoroughly understands the objects and aims of organized labor could be of inestimable value to the general public; understanding, as he does, the conditions of labor far better than the lawyer who does business in court, prosecuting unfortunates, or defending the corporations against just and equitable claims.

When organized labor, through labor unions, realizes that the pie and cake are for those who help themselves, then will labor, irrespective of class or condition, begin to come into its own. Capital has long had its paid votaries spreading broadcast the seed that to endorse any candidate for office would bring the disruption of labor organizations. Why should they not advise along these lines? With labor unions uniting upon no one in particular, always working as individual units, how could labor expect to receive any consideration from the men backed by those interests inimical to labor organizations?

Does any one for a moment believe that Mr. Peabody, of Colorado, could be elected to the office of governor had the legislature, or its members, been pledged to labor unions, and the unions had men in the field against those who seated him? Not for one moment. It is another painful example of what organized labor will go through to keep out of politics. Colorado had a state eight-hour law, but Colorado neglected to see that men were placed in a position to protect it, upon whom they could rely. Labor unions spend thousands upon thousands of dollars in lobbying bills and opposing bills. Why not send men to the seat of lawmaking who do not need to be lobbied with? Why not endorse men known to be safe and broad-minded men, and when once endorsed, labor for their election with the same zeal and strength as one puts forth to wrest a living wage for self and fellow? WILL J. ROHR

Minneapolis, Minn.

WE ARE OFTEN OVER-PRECISE.

There have been times when an endorsement by a labor union of a candidate for an elective office, as well as an appointive office, would have been a good one, and, again, would have been a bad one. There has come and gone good and bad from such acts by labor unions, that are matters of record which, no doubt, can be found spread upon the minutes of various locals and central bodies throughout the country.

With disregard of the fact that several of the foremost international unions prohibit political action of any kind, we frequently hear of labor unions "meddling in politics," and, in some instances, the promoters thereof had scruples, and, again, the action was prompted by courtesy.

We are often over-precise. LOU S. COOMBES.

Correspondence

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

The contest is on. After two conferences with the typothetæ, several meetings of No. 21 devoted to the main subject of discussion—the eight-hour day—and the usual amount of preliminary work on both sides, the first week of July saw the dividing of forces, with first honors on the side of the union. We were informed at divers times that all the offices, except two or three, were signed up on the nine-hour basis, but we found that only sixteen offices, many of them small, though included in the list are the two largest on the coast, had decided to open on the longer workday. However, they are still unopened, though two weeks have passed by.

Eighty-eight label offices remain on the fair list. About one hundred and seventy-five people were locked out on the third day of July. This number includes apprentices and errand boys, and the list has been augmented by those who were locked out of open and unfair shops on refusing to work nine hours. The latter responded surprisingly well. Public sympathy and the press are on our side unanimously, and we have such a strong case that the normal mind is unable to withstand argument favorable to the eight-hour day.

The typothetæ side is reinforced by the secretary of the United Typothetæ of America, John MacIntyre, thus showing that the effort to reinstate the nine-hour day is influenced by the general movement antagonistic to eight hours. Money has been spent liberally in advertising in the California papers for help. Display "ads" asked beseechingly for competent printers, pressmen and feeders, but the results have proved discouraging—from a nine-hour standpoint. The union men and women are a solid phalanx, and the same may be said of the apprentices and those outside our ranks. Probably four hundred positions (including pressmen and feeders) were vacated. From all sources the typothetæ has secured less than twenty hands, and many of these are incompetent. A carload was sent out from St. Louis. It contained twenty-six persons. Two managed the party—A. C. Bremer, of the Greeley Printery of St. Louis, and an attorney named Cornet. Five are women and children, and the remaining nineteen are identified with the printing business in some way or other. After two days in the coast metropolis, six or seven have associated themselves with the typographical union, four are incompetent and prejudiced against work, and we will capture several of the remaining eight. So the typothetæ didn't gain much on the carload!

One of the nine-hour offices, the Commercial Publishing Company, has installed an elaborate boarding-house outfit for would-be boarders. Cots are furnished those who sleep, a cook presides over a gas range, and the new "Commercial Hotel" is one of the jokes of the town. Citizens' alliance guards escort those who desire such protection, and the small handful of non-unionists are virtually prisoners. The only reason for this espionage is the fact that directly those who have been brought to San Francisco under gross misrepresentation—they were told that there was no strike or lockout—are acquainted with the truth, they ally themselves with those who are working in the interest of all.

Our people are enthusiastic "eight-hourers." The powerful labor movement of San Francisco is behind us. We have several hundred members working, and the financial support of the International Typographical Union is pledged. While reference has been made before to the attitude of the papers—daily and weekly—it calls for reiteration. The columns of the dailies are at our disposal, and we have not been slow to avail ourselves of the opportunity. An occasional editorial pours hot shot into our friend the enemy's camp. Every weekly paper has supported No. 21 vigorously, excepting a citizens' alliance sheet, and this one has been very mild on the subject, and is operating on the eight-hour plan sooner than lose its competent help.

The St. Louis party was brought into town under guard, conveyed across the bay in a small launch—the men, women and children huddled together in the cabin, and the women were treated as so much cattle. When the prisoner system of the "Commercial Hotel" was introduced, it is not to be wondered at that the travelers from the "Mound City" rebelled.

The situation looks good to us. Our scale calls for eight hours in the book and job section, and the typothetæ's efforts will prove futile to change it.

Howard J. Lawler died on July 15th, aged forty-four years. He was a native of Brooklyn, N. Y., and his unassuming and sterling character endeared him to his associates.

The seventeenth annual convention of the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union was held in San Francisco during the week commencing June 19. The delegates were royally entertained, and have naught but pleasant recollections of California hospitality. The convention decided to stand firmly for the eight-hour day in this city, and the International officers were instructed to stay over until the controversy is adjusted.

The Union Printers' Mutual Aid Society picnic on July 2 was a complete success. Perfect weather and excellent arrangements combined to satisfy the members and their friends, and Fernbrook Park in Niles canyon looked its prettiest. A unique program was designed for the occasion, and the games and dancing proved attractive features of the day's entertainment. WILL J. FRENCH.

NOTE.—Since the above correspondence reached THE JOURNAL the editor has been informed by the officials of No. 21 that the Crocker office, the largest printing establishment on the coast, and one of the firms to lock out its employes, has signed a contract with the union for two years, granting a continuance of the eight-hour day. This effectively breaks the backbone of the lockout and reduces the number of printers involved to about one hundred.—Ed. JOURNAL.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Charles T. Graff, one of the delegates from Columbia Union to the Birmingham convention, 1901, has resigned his position as a proofreader in the government printing office and secured one in the United States department of commerce and labor. Formerly a Pittsburger, Mr. Graff has been in this city something over fifteen years. He makes another of the large number of printers who have succeeded in getting comfortable clerkships under the government after graduating from Uncle Sam's great printery.

August Donath, another of our printer-clerks, who represented Columbia Union at the Boston convention of 1875—thirty years ago—and who is known in printing circles from one end of the country to the other, and not least for his valuable services in connection with the establishment of the Union Printers' Home as one of the first trustees, was promoted to "clerk class 4" in the pension office on July 1, bringing his annual salary up to $1,800.

John B. Dickman, president of Columbia Union in 1888 and delegate to Pittsburg in 1886, on July 3 completed two years' presidency of the central labor union and twenty-five years' membership in Columbia Union. On retiring from the presidency of the central labor union, Jere F. McCarthy, of the bartenders' league, was elected to succeed him.

The association of ex-delegates of Columbia Typographical Union No. 101 held its quarterly meeting on July 2, at which President Zach T. Jenkins (Syracuse, 1898) and Treasurer Charles W. Otis (Boston, 1891) were present, but Secretary John T. Herbert (Cincinnati, 1902) had a "sub" on in the person of James Monroe Kreiter (Denver, 1899, representing Harrisburg, and Birmingham, 1901, representing Philadelphia). It appearing that the absence of the secretary was occasioned by a prior engagement to get married, the association voted him its felicitations. No business of importance was transacted, but there was a lively discussion of the proposition to disband on account of lack of interest. Committees were appointed to draft suitable resolutions on the death of ex-Delegates Charles E. Clark and Alfred P. Marston.

An investigation of the respective merits of the Mergenthaler and Lanston machines by a departmental commission has been in progress for a week or more at this writing, but is expected to bring its labors to a close in a day or two. The investigation was ordered by the president, the occasion being an order for seventy-two machines made by the public printer. It is more than likely that the decision of the commission will be made before this reaches the readers' attention, but I am not going to guess at it.

George F. Halsey has resigned from the sixth (Record) division of the government printing office to take a clerkship in the engineering department of the Panama canal enterprise. Mr. Halsey has been here half a dozen years or so, prior to which he was known throughout the Pacific and western states.

J. E. F. (or "Texas") Smith was recently employed on the Stryker (Ohio) Advance, and perhaps is yet. There is hardly a hamlet in the United States where his name will not be remembered.

Secretary George G. Seibold recently received a letter from Superintendent Deacon of the Union Printers' Home, stating that Carlos B. Tomlin, one of Columbia Union's representatives in the Home, had sufficiently recovered to undertake the battle of life once more. This was his second admission to the Home, he having unwisely, after his first visit, returned to this city, the climate of which seems peculiarly unsuited for the victims of pulmonary troubles, only to find himself in worse condition than he had been before going to Colorado.

At a recent meeting of the ex-delegates of the brotherhood of bookbinders of this city a committee, consisting of W. C. Connor (chairman), John M. Touey (vice-chairman), J. A. B. Espey (treasurer), and Charles F. Miller (secretary), was appointed to make arrangements for the annual convention of the brotherhood of bookbinders to be held in this city the second week in June, 1906.

The public printer has designated a room in the new government printing office as a sort of hospital, to which those injured or suddenly taken sick may be taken for treatment until taken home or to a hospital, and has appointed Dr. W. J. Manning, a compositor, physician in charge. The need of such an emergency hospital has long been recognized. Dr. Manning is a Bostonian, who during his dozen years here studied and graduated in medicine.

This is the season of vacations and there are not many happenings. As I have no further news to give, I will not unnecessarily encroach on Editor Bramwood's much-demanded space.

A. F. Bloomer.

There can not be a remote thought in any one's mind that the August convention will recede from the position the International took on the eight-hour proposition. The results thus far accomplished bespeak much success by the first of next January, and it can be looked for that almost every delegate in the Toronto convention can bring a cheering report from his bailiwick. Each succeeding circular sent out by the eight-hour committee indicates that consistent work is being done to bring about the referendum's wish. The chances are that every delegate will be more earnest and determined that January 1, 1906, shall be banner day of the International Typographical Union's existence. We are going to win. Stick well together.

Delightful program those Canadians have arranged for the week of August 14. Lots of pleasure in store.

The death rate in Columbia Union has been exceptionally heavy during the first six months of 1905.

The Globe chapel, of New York, which was merged with the Commercial Advertiser, favored its fellow craftspeople with a handsome chapel souvenir. Besides giving a résumé of the Commercial Advertiser and the Globe newspapers, it briefly gives a history of the chapel. The portraits of the members shows that there is a healthy and worthy force at work. The whole affair is gotten up with taste and care. The members of the Post chapel appreciated the favor of a copy.

It is fair to assume that the delegate who wishes to change International law will be as prominent at Toronto as he has been at other conventions. So may it be.

Frank Fisher, the wealthy machine operator, has left Washington, and is helping Joe Bamberger to put out the Baltimore Herald. Frank gets much enjoyment out of this life.

The knocker who will not boost is carrying an overweight of conceited ignorance.

There is every indication that a goodly number of Columbia's members will go to Toronto.

The Union Outfitters for Men's store, which was started with subscriptions of stock taken up by traues union men, is now out of business. A complication of affairs wholly uncontrollable arose and the managers had no other recourse than go into bankruptcy. The union wage-earners of Washington are not yet educated to the worth of a co-operative concern which had the label on every garment in the store. It may be, however, that many trade unionists think that it is not the proper caper to go into business.

The Washington delegation will have a Knapp going to the next convention. Gee!

Andrew Evans, who represented Richmond, Va., in the Washington convention, and was later president of No. 90, is now working on the Washington Times.

The correspondents' society will have a meeting at Toronto. Try and get there. There is no telling what may be pulled off. Mr. Cooke, of Boston, has a nice proposition on tap.

No one can dodge the inquiry concerning the contract for six dozen Lanston typesetting machines, and the dove of peace may be winged.

The exposure of the corrupt practices of the politician in Philadelphia gives rise to the hope that trade unions generally will no longer be controlled, one may say, by the henchmen of the bosses in the Quaker City, and the recent raid of disorderly houses gave evidences of still greater degradation. It is hoped at least that the printers' union will become strong and be able to defeat the nine-hour defi of the typothetæ in that city.

The St. Louis episode is much like the cat-came-back affair.

J. J. Dirks, who writes so intelligently from St. Louis, will no doubt do some talking at Toronto, he being a delegate. And let me say that he can say many wise things.

He is not the wise man who calls the other fellow dumb.

"Honor and shame from no condition rise. Act well thy part, there all the honor lies," says Pope. This saying applies in strong force in the work of accomplishing the eight-hour day. The time of positive action is fast approaching, and the more steadfast and effective must be our labor to win.

Many of the delegates and visitors en route to Toronto will stop at Niagara Falls. They will not only see a marvel of nature, but if what the esteemed Locke says, and it is fair to assume that he knows what he is talking about, they will stop in a city that has no "W'ah" in it.

The many friends of Henry Noyes condole with him in the loss of his wife, who died recently, after a brief illness of typhoid fever. Mrs. Noyes was an estimable woman and a charming helpmeet. Mr. Noyes is one of the best known printers in Uncle Sam's employ.

William Leeper, who was let out of the government service when a reduction of the force in the big printery took place at the adjournment of congress, has accepted a position as proofreader on the Times.

A summer vacation is easily secured on the Washington newspapers, as work is exceedingly dull, especially in the handset end of the concern.

Major John T. Herbert, who was one of the delegates to the golden jubilee convention in 1902, was quietly married to Miss Ida May Linger, of this city, on July 2. This is the "major's" third matrimonial venture, death having taken two helpmeets from him. He is still a young man and is an exceptionally fine fellow. His many friends extend best wishes. The association of ex-delegates, in session on the wedding day, sent hearty congratulations.

The association of ex-delegates voted down a proposition to disband, and those who pass through Washington en route to Toronto will find the glad hand everywhere, and all will be nicely entertained. Come this way.

There are one or two printing offices in Washington that will grant the eight hours at the schedule time. And they will do so graciously, too. Others will follow suit, because wisdom will govern their action.

There should be no fear of arbitration when the cause of the printer is just.

The trade papers which find good things in THE JOURNAL and republish the same might be liberal enough to give proper credit.

Let us all work hard, diligently and unceasingly so that we can celebrate the triumph of the eight-hour proposition with the keen delight and satisfaction that characterized Young America's celebration of the glorious Fourth. Success in our contention will be boomed with equal force and pride.

A well-known Washington printer has applied for a patent for a new style of water wagon. According to its construction there is no such thing as getting on it. The fellow who has gone away from aqua vitæ gets into the vehicle, which has high sideboards inclined sharply. These are smooth as glass, and it is impossible to climb up. The bottom of the wagon-bed is of steel. Although in use but a short time it is extremely popular.

There is a growing tendency that a goodly number of printers and their wives will take John Chinn's advice and tell the conductor to put them off at Toronto.

There seems to be a discrepancy in the figures given out by the typothetæ people as to the increase in the price of production when the eight-hour day is being worked. The figures run from 15 to 25 per cent. But no reasons are given for the increase in the price of production. It is but an effort to discredit the contention for a shorter workday with the consumer. Shallow is the reasoning of President Ellis et al.

San Francisco union printers, having the press and public with them, are sure to win against the nine-hour demand of the local typothetæ. Just as soon as assessments get heavy the membership of the typothetæ will be on the decrease.

F. R. Spencer, who works on the Times, was recently married to a Washington young lady. The happy couple spent part of their honeymoon at Atlantic City.

William Garland Raybold, called familiarly "Ray," has again gone from Washington. He will stop at Cleveland, where he will join Mrs. Raybold, and will then go to Chicago. He expects to locate at the latter place.

In Toronto we will meet, God's willing.

ST. LOUIS, MO.

H. W. Cherouny writes entertainingly in the July Inland Printer on the eight-hour movement. While fair in the main in his statements and arguments, his thesis, as a whole, is a plea for compromise. In likening the relations between the International Typographical Union and its local unions to the erroneous view held by southern democrats of Calhoun's school of the relation of state to nation—well, the gentleman's copy was evidently "in hand" prior to June 12. That the International Typographical Union does control its limbs has been amply demonstrated. The International Typographical Union's move for shorter hours is national in scope, as was the campaign for nine hours. Obviously, a universal uniform scale of wages is no more practical than a universal scale of prices for printing. It is to be hoped that Mr. Cherouny's appeal to reason will be heeded by his fellow-employers, who have steadfastly spurned invitations to confer.

The job trade in St. Louis is moving along in its accustomed way. Following the rescinding by No. 8 of the nine-hour contract, it was naturally to be expected that the typothetæ would take important action. That body held several meetings and finally decided to let the matter rest pending action on the eight-hour question by the Toronto convention. The latest report of No. 8's officers indicates that several offices are paying the increased rate provided by the rescinded scale ($19.50), while the others are paying the old rate of $18. The printers of St. Louis are taking the view that the recent troubles are a closed incident, and are standing pat for eight hours. No. 8's delegates to Toronto were instructed to this end at the July meeting.

The Society of Typographical Journal Correspondents, which was organized during the St. Louis convention, will hold its annual meeting on Tuesday evening, August 15, at the Rossin House, Toronto. The society has now over twenty-five members, which number is constantly increasing. The secretary has endeavored to invite the membership of every regular contributor to the official organ. If some have failed to receive an invitation, they are requested to consider themselves invited and correspond with the undersigned, at 1338 Walton avenue, St. Louis.

Ever and anon I am requested to explain the "on to Toronto" "joke." I confess my utter inability to do so, for if there has ever been a moment from the day I shied my caster into the political arena until this hour when the slightest atom of the material popularly supposed to enter into the "make-up" of a joke has made itself apparent on my limited horizon, it certainly had sufficient chameleon propensity to remain invisible to my unclothed optic. Let the galled jade wince!

Subordinate unions should adopt the idea of organizing the apprentices, as has been done here. It is a wise plan to keep in touch with the boys at all times. Section 75, general laws, requires the certification of apprentices, which law is strictly enforced locally, but something more than this is necessary, which can only be supplied by the cooperation of journeyman, employer and apprentice.

Charles W. Fear, treasurer of the Society of Typographical Journal Correspondents, came over from Kansas City recently and renewed old acquaintanceships. He has succeeded to the chairmanship of the legislative committee of the state federation of labor, and proposes to show how the legislators voted at the last session on bills affecting labor.

All union printers who have ever worked in Providence, R. I., should write to William Carroll, 131 Tockwotten street. The committee on souvenir is anxious to secure a complete list in connection with a history of the printing business in the Rhode Island city.

"There goes a man who has done more than any one else to arouse the people," remarked Wrongfont Perkins. "Labor agitator?" queried Tightline Tucker. "Nope—alarm clock manufacturer."

The orator, in explaining the circumstance that he had changed positions on the question at issue, attempted to justify his course thus: "I had a reason for my original attitude on this matter. Now I have lost my reason."

The schoolboy who described backbone as being "something the ribs are hung on to and which keeps you from having legs clear up to the neck" is not in such an imprecated minority in his definition at that.

The young man had requested a slight advance in salary, which his employer refused to grant. "However," said the latter, "since time is money, you can hereafter work until 6 o'clock instead of 5."

The friends of John H. Barnes will regret to learn that the accident he sustained six months ago has left him permanently disabled.

An editor having a contract with a paper which changed ownership has been put to work by the new proprietor editing almanacs. And there's worse "bogus."

RESOLUTIONS BY ST. LOUIS UNION.

At a meeting of St. Louis Typographical Union No. 8, held July 2, 1905, the following resolution was adopted:

Whereas, The referendum vote of this union on the eight-hour proposition showed a result of 564 in favor and 96 against; and,

Whereas, By reason of misunderstanding the situation (the application of the eight-hour law), the union did, on June 8 in special meeting, place itself on record as seemingly opposed to the eight-hour day by ordering the signing of a nine-hour contract, resulting in a suspension of its charter by the executive council, and later, on June 18, rescinded its former action and repudiated the contract so signed in order to preserve its charter rights; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That Typographical Union No. 8, in regular meeting, reaffirms its position as indicated by the referendum vote, declares it to be the true sentiment of its members, and instructs its delegates to the Toronto convention to use all honorable means to its accomplishment; and, be it further

Resolved, That these resolutions be published in the August number of THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL.

St. Louis, Mo. J. J. EARLY, Secretary.

DULUTH, MINN.

Work here continues rather quiet, but we have hopes for better times when winter comes again.

Maurice Cohen, who learned his trade on the News-Tribune, has drawn his card and left for California. Everybody was sorry to see Maurice go, as he was one of those fellows who made many friends and no enemies.

The new officers were installed at the July meeting, and a label committee was appointed. The label committee has been working overtime lately, putting out advertising and booming the label in every possible way. This is work that should have been done a year ago, but better late than never.

The eight-hour situation looks promising here, and when our present scale expires October 1, we believe that it will cause but little trouble to have the new scale include the eight-hour agreement.

I received an invitation last month to join the Society of Journal Correspondents. We're with them all the time for making THE JOURNAL better, if such a thing is possible.

Eight hours—no more—no less.

The delegates stood on Ontario's shore, singing—
Eight hours!

And the billows re-echoed the thunderous roar—

Of a fanciful thing that no good can bring?
And the typographical welkin continued to ring—

BOSTON, MASS.

The officers and members of the book and job branch of No. 13 are being widely congratulated upon the success, both social and financial, of their May party, one-half of the proceeds of which were donated to the Cummings memorial fund. The total receipts were $489.95, expenses $297.90, leaving a balance of $192.05. It was unanimously voted that $100 be turned into the treasury of No. 13 as the branch's contribution toward the Cummings memorial fund, and the remainder was placed to the credit of the branch, to be devoted to forwarding the general interests of the book and job trade and to aid in organization work looking toward the establishment of the eight-hour day. The book and job branch is at present in the most flourishing condition in its history, and with efficient officers, an enthusiastic membership and a substantial treasury, it is expected that much eight-hour work will be accomplished through its agency during the next six months. At the last meeting the following officers were unanimously re-elected: Chairman, Joseph B. Gill; vice-chairman, Edward A. Boyle; secretary, Thomas J. Sears; treasurer, Charles W. Ussher. Refreshments were served at the close of the meeting. The flourishing condition of the Boston branch and the success of its May party should be an inspiration to other book and job branches to go and do likewise, and so provide themselves with the sinews of war.

The officers of the Franklin Typographical Society are making an earnest effort to increase its membership, and are meeting with considerable success. It is desired that next year, when the society will celebrate Franklin's two hundredth birthday, that it will have the largest membership in its history. At the July meeting Hon. John F. Fitzgerald and Samuel Stevens, of Boston, Robert Parrock, Walter J. Berwick, Thomas A. Houllahan and William W. Waldheim, of Norwood, were elected honorary members. A number of Norwood people connected with the printing business have received invitations to become active members.

Frank McGarrity, who had his arm broken in an electric car accident, is around again, but does not expect to get to work for a couple of months. He has placed his case against the elevated road in the hands of an attorney. The watch raffled for his benefit was won by No. 113, held by Frank F. Eustis.

At the June meeting of No. 13 a resolution was unanimously adopted instructing our delegates to the Toronto convention to do all in their power to secure the adoption of measures favoring a parcels post system for the United States. The matter of sick, old-age and out-of-work benefits was discussed and referred to the committee on revision of the constitution. The question of a Labor day parade was ordered placed on the circular and made a special order of business for the next meeting. The balance of No. 13's pro rata share to the Cummings memorial fund was appropriated. The secretary's report showed a membership of 1,428, and the treasurer's report showed total funds on hand to be in excess of $9,000, $18,000 having been collected during the year. The officers elected in May were installed.

President O. C. Willcomb, of Lynn Typographical Union, who has been a member of the common council of that city for the past two years, will be a candidate for alderman this fall. He succeeded in getting an order through the council calling for the union label on all city printing, but it was killed by the board of aldermen. However, as a result of the agitation, the bulk of the work has been placed in union shops. Mr. Willcomb is a highly respected citizen, and has a splendid record as a public official.

Members of the typothetæ make the claim that they do not discriminate against members of the union, but at Cushing's Norwood Press union people are not being given an opportunity to learn to operate the monoline machines, the office preferring to "break in" non-union girls, and on the forty monoline machines in use in Boston there is not one union operator. Is it any wonder that we doubt the sincerity of "open shop" advocates?

The June meeting of No. 13 authorized the eight-hour committee to issue invitations to all typographical unions in New England to send delegates to a convention to be held in Boston, to consider ways and means of furthering the eight-hour day. This is a step in the right direction, and it is hoped that the meeting may result in stimulating the eight-hour movement all over New England.

Brother Meade, of Philadelphia, in commenting on the tenacity of nicknames, infers that I was not aware that the "Jessie" I attached to Mr. Josslyn's name in a recent item was a pseudonym. He is mistaken. I was fully aware of it and how it originated, but the nickname should have been quoted. He is mistaken also in Mr. Josslyn's name. It is Herbert A., not "Herbert W."

The book and job branch has recommended to No. 13 that in future elections of officers crosses be used, instead of erasing names. It has been the experience that many members do not erase enough names in certain instances, thus rendering the ballot void, and it is thought that by using crosses after names the proper number will be voted for.

Two of the boys on the American have recently been honored with the highest offices in the gift of the lodges of which they are members. F. W. Thorpe has been installed as noble grand of Harmony lodge, I. O. O. F., of Medford, and Harvey Chappel as chancellor commander of Webster lodge, K. of P., of Dorchester.

I agree that President Lynch ruled correctly in the case you mention, Brother Newton, that "the oldest competent sub should have the first regular situation." That is exactly the ground I have taken. I also agree that the majority of subs are good workmen; but all subs are not competent, and you know it as well as I do. Varied reasons conspire to hold such a sub in an office, and the fact that he is not discharged is not always a proof of ability. I thought I had made myself perfectly clear on this question.

Robert Edwards has been elected chairman of the Post chapel. William Aldrich, ex-chairman, has gone to Worcester, as has also William Fitzpatrick, vice-chairman. I presume that the incident may now be considered closed.

Neil Gilchrist, recently of Wright & Potter's, has written to some of his Boston friends that he is having a good time in Scotland. Robert Cuthbertson, of the Norwood Press, is also spending a month at his old home in Scotland.

"Boxcar Pete" Ward, ex-secretary of Syracuse Typographical Union, and one of the best known printers in the country, was in town on a visit last month. He says things look rosy for the eight-hour day in Syracuse.

No. 13 has a committee of five working on the revision of the constitution, and I understand that something is likely to be done in the way of out-of-work benefits and pensioning aged and disabled members.

Night Foreman Charles Rolfe, of the Globe, has been enjoying a trip to his boyhood home in England. James Harvey, proofreader on the same paper, is spending a seven weeks' vacation in Ireland.

There is a strong desire on the part of prominent members of the book and job branch to have No. 13 parade on Labor day, in order to give an impetus to the eight-hour movement.

William D. Murphy, of the American, is spending a month "down home." Two weeks will be devoted to camping out around Bedford Basin, near Halifax, N. S.

Fred W. Adams was elected chairman of the Globe chapel last month. B. P. Mullany was elected vice-chairman and James A. Donovan secretary-treasurer.

WORCESTER, MASS.

The statement made by a member of the local typothetæ at the convention of the New England master printers held at Boston recently, to the effect that should the eight-hour law go into effect January 1 it would mean an increase of 20 per cent in the running expenses of his plant, is a pretty strong one and is open to criticism. If Mr. Master Printer will take his pencil and paper and figure just a minute he will find that the actual difference is only about 10 per cent. This does not include the saving in light, power, wear and tear of machinery, etc., which in the course of a year would amount to considerable; also the condition of the employe must be taken into consideration, as if he is called upon to work eight hours per diem instead of nine, giving him one hour more for rest and recreation, he certainly is fit to do more and better work for his employer. Where the gentleman got his figures that prompts him to make such a statement is a conundrum.

One of the best expressions that I have heard in favor of the eight-hour law was made a few days ago during a conversation with one of the oldest members of No. 165. Referring to the movement, he said: "I hope it will be put into effect, and I am confident of its ultimate victory. I understand there are a few of my brother members who are not overenthusiastic over it, feeling satisfied with their present condition; some men always are; but if they could see things the way I do I believe they would feel different about it, and would get a hustle on themselves. It makes me sick," he continued, "to see hod-carriers, street cleaners, carpenters, painters and many men belonging to other crafts go home from their work at 5 o'clock, while we book and job men have to plug away until 6. I have been working," he said, "in the interest of our craft for many years, and I earnestly hope I will be rewarded soon with the advent of the shorter workday."

The extreme hot weather during the months of July and August has a tendency to decrease the attendance at our union meetings, and the July meeting in consequence suffered in that respect. Notwithstanding, the meeting was an enthusiastic one, and much business was transacted. Annual reports were made by the president, financial secretary and treasurer, the latter's books showing the union to be in a flourishing condition, notwithstanding the fact that the past year had been an expensive one—two death benefits of $150 each and many other extra expenses tending to deplete the treasury. Several important suggestions were made by the president in his report, and the financial secretary's statement showed the membership to be in excellent standing. George Van Vagner was elected treasurer to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of A. J. Duggan.

The Telegram has ordered a new double-decker Mergenthaler linotype machine, which will be installed soon. This will make fourteen machines on the 'Gram. The number of employes in the composing room now nearly reaches the fifty mark. The Post management, I am told, is also considering the addition of a new machine in its composing room.

Business in the book and job offices the past month has been exceptionally quiet.

The political "bee" has started to work, and every day the papers contain announcements that Mr. So and So is being considered as a candidate for this and that office. This is an excellent opportunity for the allied printing trades council to "get its work in," and turn work into the label offices which will find its way elsewhere if they don't get after 'em.

Thomas A. Delehanty, of the 'Gram composing room, was taken to St. Vincent's hospital, July 18, to be operated upon for a serious case of rupture.

O. H. Wiggin, makeup on the Telegram, has been forced, through ill-health, to take a long vacation. He left recently and will spend about three months on a farm in New Hampshire.

President Carmody, of the central labor union, with the committee of twenty delegates, is doing some tall hustling in the interest of the annual parade and field day to be held Labor day. A majority of the local organizations have already accepted invitations to parade and also have purchased tickets for the field sports. Invitations have also been accepted by Marlboro, Clinton and Leominster Unions to take part in the parade.

The transfer of the Hamilton Printing Office to the American Type Foundry Company, which took place July 17, takes from Worcester its oldest printing establishment. The office was started in 1846 by Charles Hamilton, at that time a compositor working in this city. The plant was successfully conducted until his death, several years ago, when it was continued by his two sons, Charles and Walter. The former, who had been in poor health for some time, died in December, 1904, and the business has been carried on since by Walter Hamilton. John Mountain, the foreman, has been with the concern since 1871, and for twenty-nine years had charge of the Worcester city directory, which during those years was printed in that office. In commenting on the closing up of the place Mr. Mountain stated it seemed hard to see the old place where he had labored so many years go out of existence, and thought it would seem queer for him to go out and look up another position. Mr. Morton, who, for the past year, has been superintendent, has gone to Lynn, where he has secured a good position. Mr. Hamilton decided to take this step only a few weeks since on the advice of his physician, who declared his health would not permit his continuing the business. Charles Thompson, of the American Type Foundry, acted for his firm in disposing of the business.

The "Union Label Score Card," an advertising proposition conducted by "Sam" Sanford, of the Hurley Printery, will make its appearance, Mr. Sanford expects, about August 1. It is intended to have as many of the labels advertised as possible, and already the project bids fair to be successful. FREEMAN M. SALTUS.

DENVER, COLO.

C. W. Rhodes, for many years a member of No. 49, has gone to Honolulu, where he expects to take a proofreadership on the Gazette. Probably no man in the labor movement here has been as well known for as many years as Rhoades, and his sudden departure was a great surprise. He has been delegate from No. 49 and was treasurer and president of the local central body during his career, as well as at one time being a member of the board of public works. His family is still here.

Webb Purdy asks me to say that he has not bought into the Great Western Printing Company, but is just an employe therein.

The annual wazegoose of the employes of the Smith-Brooks Printing Company will break out on August 19 at Dome Rock. This is a gala event, and the firm usually does its share of the entertaining. There is a large attendance of prints and their families, and this year promises to eclipse the past efforts.

At its last meeting No. 49 appointed Messrs. Dunn, Esterling, Sterling, Birdsall and Pulver to consider the advisability of having an outing at some mountain resort the coming month. There will be things diding at this function.

Frank Pulver, H. E. Garman and Charley Seitz will probably be the only Denverites aside from the delegates and their families that will make the trip to Toronto. It is a long way from home, and the infrequency of freight trains precludes a larger attendance.

"Kid" Shields refused to run for president of the trades assembly again, and the only plum to our union was Albert May for sergeant-at-arms.

At the election of officers of the allied printing trades council Frank Stewart, stereotyper, was elected president; W. T. Scott, press assistant, vice; Carl Jurgens, bookbinder, sergeant-at-arms; H. E. Garman, printer, secretary-treasurer. This will make Garman's tenth year. The council is in good shape, has nine unions affiliated, has had the eight-hour day for all trades for two years or more, has contracts with all offices, and secured all this by harmonious working of the unions of the craft here, and without the cost of a dollar extra or loss of a minute's time. There are no nine-hour clouds on the horizon in this bailiwick.

Typographical Union No. 49 can always be depended upon to do the right thing at the right time. At the last meeting $100 was voted the entertainment committee of the national encampment of the G. A. R., which meets here in September, and it was not asked for, either; and it also should be remembered that when the labor troubles raged here some time ago, several of the posts of that order in the state came to the front by offering their services to the then governor to help maintain what they termed "law and order," but what we think was persecution and attempted disruption. It is safe to say that such proffers only came from the blatherskite and political grafter. Talk about heaping coals of fire or returning good for evil! Our action is the talk of the town, but no other labor organization has followed suit.

"Hop" (Howard T.) Lee, the old-timer, known from Texas to Wyoming, recently disposed of his interest in a Grand Junction paper; since quitting the News proof desk he is devoting his time to sketch writing.

A carload of strike breakers went through here the other day, bound for the trouble at 'Frisco. They were practically all union men—pressmen, printers and the like, who were thus enjoying a jaunt to the coast at the expense of the misguided employers. Will they never learn?

J. V. Warfield arrived from Des Moines lately, and is stone man at Carson-Harpers. The change was made necessary by the condition of Mrs. W.'s health. Warfield was delegate from his town to Washington, and was also elected president of Des Moines Union at the last election.

A new one in the line of a panhandler flashed across the ethereal blue the other day. A well-dressed gentleman passed his card around at the Post; a diamond ring and a gold watch formed a conspicuous part of his raiment. Asked what the occasion for the touch was, he stated that it was to get his trunk out of the express office, it having preceded his arrival from 'Frisco, so he could get a change of linen. He made good all right, as the novelty of the plea seemed to appeal. Talk about the old boys! Their work for a drink or breakfast and bed would be about as appealing in this class as a Frenchman giving a Chinaman music lessons. Can it be that the machine is responsible for this, too?

Jake Vander Perel's friends here were pleased with the news that President Lynch had appointed him on the law committee. He will be heard from.

S. B. Culbertson, of the government printing office at Washington, was here with the Christian Endeavorers last month. He presented a letter of introduction to me from F. N. Whitehead, of that city, the erstwhile tourist and chairman of No. 101's entertainment committee, stating that "Brother Culbertson does not drink, chew, smoke, gamble or stay out nights, but otherwise he and I work finely together in church work." I was glad to meet Brother C., enjoyed his visit greatly, and found him a very pleasant gentleman. Whitehead will be remembered by all the old-time trailers throughout the west, but, just the same, I still wonder what he meant by that letter.

John Henderson, for about twenty-five years connected with the mechanical department of the Times, has quit to take the position of investigator of the poor, an appointment from the republican county administration. Henderson was delegate to Philadelphia from this union, and has always taken an active interest in politics.

Colorado Springs is going after the next convention in great shape, and it will be a wonder if it don't land it. The unions of the state are with No. 82, and those at Toronto will aid in what ways they can. If the convention comes out here, No. 49 can be depended upon to give all who wander within our gates a time they can tell their grandchildren about. Lots of the old boys who attend these gatherings still talk about the time Denver did the honors in the long ago. The spirit is still here.

So far there is no echo of the eight-hour fight reaching us. The time for giving notice on the part of the employers for a change in the present contract between all the printing crafts and the employers was at the meeting of the council on July 19, but there was nothing doing, and as the contract is perpetual unless opened in July—expiring in September—we are in for another year of the boon, unless the proprietors wilfully break it, which there is no possibility of their doing. So mote it be. HARVEY E. GARMAN.

QUEBEC, CANADA.

There was a time when unionism was not thought of much by the Quebec workingmen, and there was well-nigh only the Quebec typographers that were organized as union men. The wages were as low as possible, owing to non-organization. The label was an unknown thing. But today it seems that tradesmen, especially printers, have understood that unionism is synonymous of success. So it was when the city council of Quebec received the tender for its printing. Since times remote—over twenty-five years—the city council has always granted its printing to a non-union printing office. There is in the council an alderman proprietor of a printing office in which non-union men are working at a price not necessary to mention in THE JOURNAL, and to this office was always given the city printing. This facility for obtaining such printing was that his sons were making the tenders in their own name, for it is forbidden for an alderman to accept any contract from the city. This year the Quebec Chronicle has opposed its prices to the former, and the result is that this union office will do the work for the city. But one thing is to be mentioned. In the city treasurer's report there were many pages that remain standing yearly, only figures to change, and it was easy for the non-union office to make its prices lower than any other. Here Quebec Typographical Union No. 302 has acted with tact, and given a striking example of the broadminded spirit that animated its members, for they unanimously agreed to pay a weekly tax to enable the Quebec Chronicle to put its prices lower than the non-union office; this tax serves to pay for union men employed to do the composition of the pages kept standing by the scab office; the Chronicle, having the lower prices, has obtained it. It is certainly a great step for our union, as all this printing, in changing hands, makes work for union men instead of scabs. Seeing that this contract was for such a long time granted to non-union offices, our victory is more valued, for the longer the sickness has grown inveterate the more difficult it is to dislodge it. Let all union men try to obtain a like success in the printing for their own city council.

It is to be hoped that a number of delegates will pay a visit to Quebec city, the "unique," as A. M. Steele said in his last correspondence. It is true that our city does not possess "ladies' entrances surrounded by red lights," but for the picturesque it is one of most renowned on the continent. The Château Frontenac is one of the first-class hotels of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; its site is on the Dufferin Terrace, and from there it is impossible to find a better coup d'œil.

LEON LORTIE.

SIOUX FALLS, S. D.

No. 219 was never in better shape than it is now, and January 1 will find the boys closely allied together for any kind of a struggle that may come up. The employing printers are going to resist the eight-hour scale, but with what success remains to be seen. The odds are on the printers' side.

At our last meeting a resolution was presented and adopted by a large vote which will enable us to build up a fund for the struggle. The main part of it is that every member working four and one-half days a week shall pay 50 cents for the enlarging of our fund, making in all $2 a month, besides his per capita tax. The scheme is a good one, and was heartily endorsed by all present, and by January 1 will accumulate quite a large sum.

C. W. Post, of Battle Creek, Mich., had a half-page ad in one of our local dailies this month, in which he appealed to the people in general to put down labor unions, calling them thugs, murderers and the enemies of peace. That old rantankerous crank has more money than brains, and as far as harm coming from his pen is concerned, we are of the opinion that the intelligent public are too wise to be led by such talk as he puts up—but it makes more work for the printers.

Sioux Falls will celebrate Labor day "en fete," and will try and eclipse all former events. Here's hoping that all will turn out and make it a day to be long remembered.

No. 219 will be represented at the Toronto convention by our able president, J. H. J. Black. Mr. Black is a willing worker in the cause of unionism, and is found at all times doing something towards the betterment of the cause. He is editor of the Labor Gazette, a healthy and still growing magazine. W. DAVIS.

DETROIT, MICH.

Notwithstanding the torrid weather with which Detroit has been visited during the past few days, the eight-hour committee of the typographical union has kept at work as hard as though it was delightfully cool, and on Monday evening, July 16, brought off a large and enthusiastic meeting of book and job printers. Charles O. Bryce, one of our veterans, presided, and W. S. Haight, International Typographical Union organizer for this district, was the principal speaker, delivering an eloquent, forceful and convincing address, carrying conviction to the heart of every member present. Speeches were also made by D. R. McDonald, C. O. Bryce, George J. King, late editor of the Michigan Union Advocate, F. A. Hubbard and Henry Poole, president of the allied printing trades council. Several communications of a most cheering character, from both inside and outside the state, were received and read to the meeting. The following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Whereas, The International Typographical Union will, on January 1, 1906, inaugurate an eight-hour workday in every city under its jurisdiction; and,

Whereas, This movement is for the bettering of the conditions of the printers of the United States, Mexico, and Canada; and,

Whereas, We are of the opinion that, in view of the fact that changed conditions of the trade have cheapened and increased the product of our labor, we are entitled to some of the benefits of these changed conditions; therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the members of Detroit Typographical Union No. 18, most heartily endorse the actions of the International officers of the International Typographical Union in their endeavor to secure for us the eight-hour workday; and, be it further

Resolved, That we will do everything in our power to assist the International Typographical Union eight-hour committee in its work, and that each and every one of us will now enlist and become standardbearers, and never stop working as long as the least opposition to the movement remains.

Our eight-hour committee, composed of D. R. McDonald, F. A. Hubbard, W. J. Walker, H. A. Horton and William G. Fitzgerald, are a hustling and aggressive lot of men, and further meetings will be held under their auspices.

Steps are being taken to push the label to the fullest extent. J. H. WALKER.

It is some time since the City of the Straits has had anything to say in the columns of THE JOURNAL, though nowhere is the coming of that peerless trade magazine more eagerly looked for; but Detroit is on the way to Toronto and her hospitable instincts have been aroused, and with the desire to give those attending the convention an opportunity to see the "prettiest city on earth," the noblest river and world-famous Belle Isle, No. 18 will keep "open house" on Friday, August 11. For that day a program has been arranged which includes a trip about the city, a ride on the river, a dinner at Wolf's, a circuit of Belle Isle and a "Dutch lunch," musical entertainment and reception in the evening at the printers' club. No doubt this program will call up fond memories to those who attended the Detroit convention, especially the fortunate few who were entertained by the "Idyyllrs" on that never-to-be-forgotten "furniture wagon special," which invaded Canada one day and spent a merry afternoon at "Wolf's." Those who have been in Detroit will need no urging to repeat their visit, and those for whom that pleasure is yet in store will never regret their acceptance of this informal invitation.

Our job scale expires on August 1, and the employers seem determined to attempt an inauguration of the "open shop." We are as firmly determined to protect our members. No. 18 has been preparing for the coming struggle for years, and this city is thoroughly organized, has a large defense fund and a firm faith that, should trouble ensue, we will have the united support of the officers and members of the International.

The writer takes this occasion to express his thanks for the marked copies of certain labor papers which have recently reached him by courtesy of their publishers, evidently sent with the intention of influencing his views upon matters to come up at Toronto. Let me see, what does the obligation say?—but then editors are privileged characters, it appears. It is too much trouble to write them individually, so I here recommend them to pattern after the Michigan Advocate, which eschews scandal, but does give labor news.

Those towns with only one gang of Wahnetas must take a back seat. Detroit, so it is alleged, has two of 'em. But the rank and file are not worrying much since we are still allowed to vote, attend meetings, etc. JOHN J. MCLOGAN.

BUTTE, MONT.

Sam Teagarten has removed to Phillipsburg.

At the last regular meeting Messrs. Hogan and Lanstrum were chosen as delegates to the Montana State Federation of Labor, which convenes in August.

Delegate Purnett goes to Toronto instructed in behalf of general laws 95-102.

Butte's latest typographical graduates, Will Batten, of the Inter Mountain job room, and Max Tonn, of the Miner job department, have gone in quest of experience, the former going south and the latter coastward.

Charles Scheerer suffered a severe attack of gastritis the first of the month.

Bryant James and "Kid" Wood are doing the bungalow act together in the interest of economy and good cooking.

Since "Kid" Freeman recovered, partially at least, from his rheumatic troubles he is very partial to cushions. He and Trixie Blake have some very strenuous priority seances along that line.

At the election of officers in the Butte central council, our J. W. Hogan was elected president and Charles Scheerer a member of the executive committee. So far as deponent discovereth, the American Labor Union hasn't torn any very large chunks off the American Federation of Labor yet.

During the past month a complete change has taken place in the foremanship of Butte's dailies. Will McWhinney, foreman of the Inter Mountain, started the ball by resigning and leaving the city. Pat Geraghty, of the Miner, resigned and took the Inter Mountain stones, Tom Reynolds succeeding Geraghty. Andy Rummel wearied of the Evening News foremanship and resigned, Jimmie Sullivan, the Inter Mountain makeup, succeeding Rummel.

The following cards were received since last report: W. R. Grafe, Seattle; C. C. and S. P. Bishop, Memphis; Bryant James, Great Falls; I. W. Hutchens, Portland; Oscar Milhollan, Denver; C. H. Stewart, St. Paul; A. S. Lincoln, Duluth; W. L. Bailey, Los Angeles. The latter is an old-time Butte man, who left here last September with a team and drove to Los Angeles.

An evidence of the value of international organization is the settlement of the Spokane engineers' trouble with a large commission firm having branch houses throughout the northwest. Representatives of the engineers visited Butte and enlisted the aid of our unions, and matters were speedily adjusted in a manner wholly satisfactory to the engineers.

For twenty-one months the Butte plumbers have made a fight on a steam and gas-fitting firm here. Large banners proclaiming the fact that the firm was unfair to organized labor were carried through the streets and held by men stationed in front of the firm's place of business. On the 15th ult. notices were published in the daily press to the effect that the trouble was at an end. The firm has been in business here since 1887, and should have known Butte unionism well enough to have "come in" sooner.

The miners' union has asked for a conference with the trades and labor council, which will be granted, and doubtless it will result favorably to international unionism.

The lot upon which Butte unions hope to build a labor temple is reported clear of debt, and the temple association hopes soon to begin the erection of a home that will be a credit to the great northwest.

R. HATHAWAY.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS.

Every shop in town reported "business dull" this month.

At our July meeting the secretary read a letter from President Lynch negativing the argument by which a certain proposition was defeated in our June meeting as "unlawful." Nevertheless, before the July meeting was over there were two good motions killed by the objection that they were "unlawful" or "unconstitutional" or both—an objection which seemed to me to have no sound foundation either time.

Organizer Charles T. Scott, of the New England district, was at our meeting, and made a rousing speech on the organizing of Cambridge. The next night Charles T. Scott met Charles S. Scott, our vice-president—and also the other officers—to lay plans for work, and plans were made by which we are pretty sure of improving the Cambridge situation. The Cambridge situation is this: We have in our jurisdiction over 350 printers, less than 100 of them in the union—this in the jurisdiction of an old union which was once very strong. There are over 150 women printers, and only about three of them unionists. Under such circumstances it is a matter of course that nothing but hard work will enable us to make a good showing; and Mr. Scott (with the T) says very correctly that the local men will have to do most of the work. But his coming has distinctly started the local union to more activity, and his advice is useful to us.

Therefore, first, appoint yourself a committee of one to get in new members; second, appoint yourself a committee of one to find out who does the talking that takes so much time in our meetings, and tell him to stop; third, attend the meetings yourself—speak short, insist on business being done, and you will begin to get the meetings as you want them. We can not do without you, and if the union is worth anything it is worth supporting, even to the amount of an evening a month.

STEVEN T. BYINGTON.

MONTREAL, CANADA.

The old city of Maisonneuve: "Mont Royal," which naturally became Montreal after the treaty of peace between France and England, has just experienced a week of terrific heat, mainly caused by the great humidity. And which made the average Englishman wish the fine month of October was at hand with its "dark-brown October ale," and caused the Frenchman's temper to rise above normal point, which is never very low, and made him think a lot of his cherished "fêtes champêtres." The suffocating weather affected labor, pleasure and rest, and as a net result, very little of anything was done during the week—"Partie remise," as we say in French. During the summer months Jacques-Cartier No. 145 has decided to hold monthly meetings only.

Although the trade, as far as No. 145 is concerned, has not been quite as brisk as during the last four or five summers, it has, nevertheless, been good. For seven or eight years past the different offices under the jurisdiction of No. 145 have turned out remarkably few apprentices, which is a good policy, and has certainly helped our journeymen, but we must be on the lookout and watch "importation." Canada is as free a country as any, but "charité bien ordonné commence par soi-même," which in a way means, "self-protection is the first law of nature."

The annual picnic of No. 145 was held on the 9th inst. at Burlington, Vt., when 400 excursionists took advantage of the fine weather and cheap rates to visit that pretty little city. The outing was a social success, and helped by the generous gift from Lord Strathcona will undoubtedly prove a financial one.

Several months ago the writer was asked to scribble something about "printing before its invention," to quote the very words put to him. After searching English, French and Belgian auauthorities, a little essay was written up which will appear in the next number of THE JOURNAL if the editor deems it worthy.

Handsome William Gilmour, ex-president of No. 176, of this city, has given the whole typographical craft of Montreal an immense lift by his generous action in a sad case of drowning on the return trip of the annual excursion of the "Montreal Daily Star." M. Gilmour's deed, in its noble aim, is not only a just credit to himself, but will also be a great comfort to the father of the unfortunate little victim, M. Moorehouse. Will M. Gilmour kindly accept the congratulations of his French confrères, and the bereaved father the sincere sympathy of No. 145.

At the regular meeting of No. 176 the following resolution was unanimously passed:

That this union, having heard of the heroic action of our ex-president, William Gilmour, in jumping from the deck of the Dominion day excursion steamer into the swift current of the St. Lawrence river, in a gallant attempt to save, at the risk of his own life, a young lad who had accidentally fallen overboard; be it

Resolved, That this union place on record its unqualified admiration of the manly courage and promptness exhibited by Mr. Gilmour on this occasion and for the humanity which prompted his action, and they would respectfully call the attention of the Canadian Branch of the Royal Humane Society to this meritorious act, and suggest that such a signal instance of bravery should be recognized in some form or other by the society.

Montreal, Can. A. M. STEELE.

A CORRECTION.

In the last correspondence from Jacques-Cartier Union No. 145, of Montreal, Can., in THE JOURNAL, on page 73, paragraph 3, our correspondent, Monsieur Steele, said:

"Extraordinary proceedings have taken place lately in No. 145's meetings." Permit me to suppose that in a moment of excitement his own good judgment must have been wronged when he said: "Excitement and ignorance prevented sound judgment from prevailing." We will say right here that up to this date, excitement and ignorance have not prevailed in Jacques-Cartier's meetings, as we are proud to say that we always had at our head intelligent and cool-blooded officers. Now, let us get to the point:

As to the first statement of our correspondent, the operator mentioned was a member of the executive committee, but took part in the proceedings, not as a judge, but as the party making the charge. Members of No. 145 are sociable people, living in a civilized and progressive city, and our correspondent should be aware of this fact.

As to the second statement, the correspondent being the plaintiff, his sound judgment must have been wronged by the belief that justice has not been given, although No. 145 has always given one and all justice according to the International Typographical Union laws and regulations. It is asserted by our correspondent: "The rules of the International Typographical Union were openly violated and some very radical speeches were made," before the vote was taken; as a matter of fact and truth, after the plaintiff and defendant had spoken, the chairman tolerated the discussion, and was not called to order by any member present. Vote being taken, the verdict of guilty not carrying the two-third vote necessary, the accusation was laid on the table.

Now, how can our correspondent claim that the members of the executive committee have voted against their own verdict, as the vote was taken secretly, according to the International Typographical Union laws.

Our executive committee, as a body, made a report, but claim to have the right to vote individually as their conscience orders them in a meeting.

Although the report of the executive committee was rejected by the meeting, which had right to do so, the committee would not follow the mentioned French custom of resigning, thus creating bad feeling and dissension among members. Our correspondent should know that a committee is appointed to study a question and report, and that the meeting has the right to adopt or reject such report.

As to that chapel that considers that "it is useless to enforce the constitution," the executive commitee recommends that the latter should follow the example of the numerous other chapels under the jurisdiction of No. 145, which are working in harmony and follow, without criticism, the decisions of the union.

Now, to close this incident, we regret that our correspondent took such a step, and the executive committee, whose duty is to act on urgent matters on behalf of our union, strongly protests against the letter of the correspondent, his statement being of a nature to discredit the officers and members of No. 145, who have always been true and loyal to the International Typographical Union laws and regulations, and endeavor to put them in force.

For the Executive Committee of No. 145.

VICTOR TARDIF,
Chairman Executive Committee.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.

Rochester Typographical Union No. 15 has made preparations to entertain delegates, ex-delegates and visitors en route to the Toronto convention Saturday, August 12. The Flower City has many beautiful and picturesque attractions to offer to visitors, being in close proximity to many resorts on Lake Ontario, chief among which is Ontario Beach (the Coney Island of western New York). Delegates stopping over will have ample time to arrive in Toronto Sunday morning. Boats leave Charlotte (port of Rochester) Saturday and Sunday nights at 11:45, arriving in Toronto at about 6 o'clock next morning. Trains leave Rochester for Toronto every few hours via Buffalo. Visitors desiring to cross Lake Ontario to Toronto can secure a rate of $1.75. Visitors will be met at the various depots by a committee. Those who are detained and arrive late will proceed to Columbia hall, Cox building, St. Paul street. Following is the program as far as arranged:

Seeing Rochester by tallyho, 2:30 P. M.

Return to Columbia hall (headquarters of Typographical Union No. 15); banquet, 4:30 P. M.

Leave Columbia hall for Ontario Beach, 6 P. M.

From Ontario Beach boat can be taken to Toronto, or visitors can return to the city. The Rochester delegation will accompany the visitors who go on the boat to Toronto.

Delegates who have received postal cards for reply are requested to return them as soon as possible, before August 8 at the latest. Ex-delegates and visitors who intend to stop off at Rochester are requested to notify the committee of arrangements, box 339, Rochester, N. Y., as soon as possible, in order that plans may be made for their entertainment.

The Rochester ex-delegates' association includes B. C. Backus, president; E. S. Kates, secretary; E. C. Olds, assistant secretary; M. A. Whitmore, treasurer; W. F. Winfield, B. H. Bates, James Spinning, John J. Bolton, L. J. Hyde, T. F. Moore, George E. Faulkner.

Henry D. Henderson, delegate-elect to Toronto, has been nominated for mayor of Rochester by the social democratic party. E. C. OLDS.

TOLEDO, OHIO.

The July issue of THE JOURNAL was a much looked for and eagerly sought periodical, and for the first time in many moons it was almost impossible to find one about the various chapels the day after its arrival. In nearly every instance THE JOURNAL was taken home to be digested at leisure. The wealth of information it contained, viz.: "The St. Louis Incident," the list of delegates to the Toronto session, "Editorial Note and Comment," containing a résumé of incidents of importance to the membership, which transpired during the month preceding; "What We Are Doing" anent the eight-hour movement; "The President's Page" and the "Correspondence Department," being so evenly balanced and constructive in thought, went to make the July issue by far the best edited trade union publication of the month.

Strange things often occur about a newspaper business office that are rarely heard of in the composing room. A funny incident was brought to notice recently at the Times office. A party who was friendly toward the paper, and with a nose for news, called at the counting room to report an accident, and made notes of same on a want ad blank. The young man who attends to the receiving of telephone calls, wants, etc., at night counted the words and collected 20 cents from his informant. He then sent the report of the accident to the composing room to be inserted under heading, "Too Late to Classify."

I notice that Akron No. 182 has honored my old friend, David Fergusson, as its banner bearer at the Toronto meeting. In thus honoring Dave it is but the recognition of a long line of service in a city where to be known as a trade unionist at one time was not as popular as it is today. Dave, Gesundheit!

Another decision of importance to labor was doled out in this city recently. Three members of the structural iron workers' union, who had been detailed for "picket" duty on a new building in course of construction, and on which non-union men were employed, were, upon complaint of the contractor, brought before Police Court Judge Wachenheimer. The judge found the men guilty of "congregating on a public thoroughfare," "loitering" and "without visible means of support."

President Samuel Gompers, of the American Federation of Labor, has promised that should nothing arise in the meantime which would demand his services elsewhere, he would deliver an address in Toledo on Labor day.

In prosecuting our campaign against Postmortem Grapenuts remember "there's a reason."

The legislative committee of the central labor union has, with the aid of an attorney, prepared an ordinance which will facilitate checking the operations of local loan sharks.

While the members of the "teapot" are all "jobbers" it is doubtful if they be successful in "jobbing" the eight-hour day.

The discussion anent the piece system between Messrs. Kreiter, of Washington, and Newton, of Salt Lake, is worthy of thought and consideration. While telling points have been made by both parties to the controversy, I am inclined to give Mr. Newton the best of the arguments to date. At the rapid rate "ops" are now being turned out it is but a matter of time ere we will be compelled to adopt some more equitable system than the one now prevailing to insure justice al'round.

President Stewart and Chairman Miller, of the eight-hour committee, are not content to allow the eight-hour campaign to drag along with the belief that several months are yet to intervene before active work shall become necessary, and trusting that some overt act will bring about a conference looking toward amicable adjustment. On the other hand, the work of agitation, education and organization goes steadily on. The proprietors and managers of the local shops have been notified direct by the committee, and have been apprised of our ultimatum which becomes operative January 1, next, but as yet nothing has been received in reply to the communications sent out. This may be due to the report sent out by the "system" that there was a probability of our receding from our former declarations at the coming Toronto convention. If such is the belief, they are due to disappointment, as our ultimatum at San Francisco, St. Louis and Philadelphia would signify. It seems to me that our local employers would do well to take cognizance of this matter as early as possible, it being more honorable to arrange with the eight-hour committee looking toward the inauguration of the shorter workday at this time, rather than allow the matter to hold fire, under advice from the local "boss" who "Shields" himself behind the straw mask of the "teapot," and who would in the end gain by an open rupture between the two parties at other employers' expense—as he conducts a non-union plant. To arrange such a conference now looking toward a warless solution of the question at issue would curtail considerable unpleasantness and loss on the part of the employers, who in the end would have to comply with the terms now proposed.

A writer in one of the July magazines, who tells of "A Tale of Two Cities," sums up the situation in the following as to how so-called "bosses" retain their power:

The bums get free soup; the petty criminals "get off" in court; the plain people or their relatives get jobs or a picnic or a friendly greeting; the Germans get their beer whenever they want it; the neighborhood and ward leaders get offices and graft; "good" democrats get their share of both; shopkeepers sell to the city or to politicians or they break petty ordinances; the lawyers get cases, and they tell me that the reputation of the bench is such that clients seek lawyers for their standing, not at the bar, but with the ring; the banks get public deposits and license to do business; the public utility companies get franchises and "no regulation;" financiers get canals, etc.; they "get blackmailed," too, but they can do "business" by "dividing up;" property owners get low assessments, or high; anybody can get anything in reason by standing in.

Digitized by Google

But of the worker, who produces the wealth to pay for all this, nothing is said. What does he get? He as a rule gets what "Paddy" shot at.

The Searchlight Labor Review made its appearance early in July. It is a six-column quarto, and the first issue contained seventeen columns of boiler plate. Its editorial policy will no doubt be an elastic one, as its salutatory editorials stated that it would stand for the organized workman, the employer and the unorganized; in short, for a "square deal," as they say. A big load to carry, indeed, with three pages of plate matter.

Several former Toledoans who are summering in this vicinity have been renewing old acquaintanceships and making new ones during the past month. Louis F. Hemse, fresh from the Chicago eight-hour conference, stopped over on his way to Coshocton, Ohio, where he is now located with the Vail Linotype Company, which recently moved to that city from Cleveland. Louie says Coshocton is his last stop. Among the others were Del Angell, well known in Toledo in the old "hand set" days; Billy McMannus, of the Chicago News ad-room, and "Kid" Cole, of Pittsburg. "Kid" was combining a little business with pleasure, and when not boosting the shorter workday got in a few licks favoring Pittsburg for the 1906 meeting.

Work is very, very dull, and the only possible chance to get work in Toledo at either branch is to bring it with you. JOSEPH P. KEATING.

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.

Our scale is still hanging fire, Organizer Kinskey using every effort to have the affair adjusted without any friction, if possible, and if diplomacy will settle the question the capable organizer will have a good scale for No. 233 to work under.

Again have the ranks of No. 233 been invaded by the Grim Reaper, this time taking from us William M. Mahoney, on July 7. "Billy" Mahoney, as he was familiarly called, has carried our card for eleven years; although for the past six years he has been a reporter on the Daily Cataract, he never gave up his membership. Mr. Mahoney was an ex-president of the central labor council, and had done much through his many articles in defense of organized labor to place it on a high standard.

Great preparations are being made for a grand Labor day celebration by the central labor council. The printers will be in line under the charge of Col. F. Mortimer Hallett.

The executive council is being praised for their firm stand in the St. Louis affair, which should show the world that the resolution passed at the last convention is not mere words. It has also stiffened the backbone of several weak organizations that could not see their way clear to demand eight hours at this time. Eight hours! Eight hours!!

Chairman Meyers has been entertaining Billy Rielman and "Shorty" Woods, of No. 9. The committee has been doing good work of late.

Will Great Prophet Bloomer kindly inform us of the origin of 30?

We will meet you in the Toronto Labor Temple.

Can a girl with a rat in her hair demand a printer's card from the young man that wants to print a kiss on her lips, Mr. Cooke?

Toronto. So say we all of us.

GEORGE E. LOCK.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.

That the typographical unions throughout southern California have enlisted for the eight-hour war —if there is to be a war—was amply demonstrated Sunday, July 16, when representatives from eight towns met in conference in Los Angeles. The committee on credentials reported the following delegates:

Los Angeles—William F. Howe, Charles R. White and Francis Drake.

Pasadena—J. K. Schaeffer and D. M. Winter.

Long Beach-San Pedro—George P. Davis and Mr. Higley.

Riverside—H. L. Dunning and J. E. Cheely.

Redlands—A. R. Sayles and D. B. Kendall.

San Bernardino—C. B. Duffey and Charles Howe.

Bakersfield—J. F. Marek.

San Diego—A. S. Crane.

Organizer T. D. Fennessy called the meeting to order, after which officers were elected as follows:

President, A. S. Crane, of San Diego; vice-president, C. B. Duffey, of San Bernardino; secretary, Francis Drake, of Los Angeles; treasurer, D. B. Kendall, of Redlands; executive committee, Charles White, of Los Angeles (chairman); George P. Davis, of San Pedro, J. K. Schaeffer, of Pasadena, H. L. Dunning, of Riverside, and J. F. Marek, of Bakersfield.

By unanimous vote a permanent organization was decided upon, to be known as "The Eight-Hour Conference of Southern California." A declaration of principles was adopted, declaring the purpose of the organization to be: "The inauguration of the eight-hour workday in book and job printing offices, with the least possible friction between employer and employe; of inviting all competent non-union printers to become members of the International Typographical Union, and to work for the interest of all fair employers."

Reports of the delegates showed conditions in the various towns represented to be good, with but one exception and the prevailing opinion was that the eight-hour workday can be successfully inaugurated throughout southern California—provided, always, that every competent non-union printer is afforded the opportunity to become a member of the International Typographical Union. The organization of the country printer and the accumulation of a defense fund are absolutely necessary, which, it is gratifying to state, was fully appreciated by every delegate present. The conference adjourned to meet at Riverside on Sunday, August 20. Meanwhile the good work will go on. Enlist southern California in the eight-hour column.

It will be remembered that last year the city council of Los Angeles awarded the city printing contract to the Times, notwithstanding it submitted the highest bid, and as a result the councilman who engineered the deal was recalled—the first instance of the kind on record. Not satisfied with getting the contract at the highest figure, it has developed that the Times has flagrantly violated its contract, printing only thirteen lines of agate to the inch, when the contract specifies fourteen. As a taxpayer, Organizer T. D. Fennessy has enjoined the city auditor from paying the Times the sum of $2,076.02, which amount would have been filched from the city treasury had the thirteen-line trick not been detected. So far, the Times has made no attempt to have the injunction set aside, having had the hearing postponed twice. In addition to the amount illegally claimed, the Times presented a bill to the auditor for $1,586.13, which, with the illegal amount claimed, makes a total of $3,662.15 tied up by Organizer Fennessy's injunction. Before he can get what is legally coming to him, Mr. Otis will be compelled to go into court and show cause, if any, why he attempted to overcharge the city. Or, not wishing to do this, he can make application for the $1,586.13 legally due, and thus practically acknowledge that he attempted to "gouge" the city out of $2,076.02. In other words, it appears that Fennessy has the old gentleman "a-goin' and a-comin'."

Thomas Jenkins, foreman of the St. Louis Chronicle at the time of its consolidation with the Star, now is in Los Angeles, where he intends to locate.

Lee Riley has left town again.

The Toronto convention is being looked forward to with much interest. Let "eight hours" be the watchword. FRANCIS DRAKE.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.

Hear ye! Hear ye! All workers at the printing trade here have at last awakened from their slumber—and it is our ambition to be right in line when the finger of time points to the adoption of the eight-hour workday. As we claim to have as good crews of workmen as ever manned a printshop, so we look forward to enjoy the shorter workday before the great reaper gathers us in to man his inkless printshop.

No. 276 issued an invitation to all our prints to gather with us and express themselves on the eight-hour question and listen to Organizer Charles T. Scott. So it happened that on July 15 we assembled in goodly numbers and heard words of wisdom and wise counsel from our organizer, who not only gave us a forceful address, but untied several knotty problems that have bothered us in the past. And we voted him a return ticket, that he may come again and see the harvest gathered.

As we boast of the competence of our prints, so do we speak in admiration of our employers, who have always set the pace, both in scale of prices and hours of labor, and today we can give our neighboring cities of Fall River and Taunton quite a lead.

The eight-hour question will open an avenue for the future prosperity of the printing trade here, for the typothetæ is awakening the employer to the fact that the day of individual bargaining is past, and that in the future it must be collectively, and as they talk of the shorter workday, so will it pave the way to devise ways and means to protect the employing printer from being imposed upon and buncoed by the unfair buyer of printing. And it will redound to the better condition for the worker. For the live employer knows he can spend his time more profitably than fighting with his employes; and the workman realizes that a prosperous employer can better provide for the man who does the work.

So let it be said that every printer in our city has signified his intention to join our chorus, which is practicing the latest, entitled: "Watch us grow!" A. H. ADAMS.

ATLANTA, GA.

The friends of the child labor bill for the state of Georgia, nothing daunted by the fact of three former defeats at the hands of the Georgia solons, have again introduced the bill at the present session of the legislature, and are more hopeful than ever that it will pass both branches of the general assembly. A hearing was had before the committee on Friday, July 14, at which time the mill men had their inning. The argument put forward by the mill owners was remarkable on account of its weakness. They admitted they had no very serious objections to the bill, but desired to warn the legislature that the labor unions were behind the bill, and that this bill was only an "entering wedge" and would be followed up by more drastic bills seeking to reduce the hours of labor and otherwise dictate the manner in which their factories should be operated. "Why," said one speaker, "pretty soon they will be wanting an eleven-hour day! And if they succeed in getting that they will come back here and ask for a ten-hour day! And maybe they will even have the nerve to want a nine-hour day—who knows! What we need in Georgia is not laws to reduce the hours of labor, but laws that will compel people to work!" Another mill representative, in speaking of the "evils" of organized labor, exclaimed: "Why, gentlemen, the printers right here in Atlanta have got things down to such a fine point that Clark Howell and 'Dick' Gray, owners of the Constitution and the Journal, respectively, are not allowed to bring their own boys into their own shops and learn them to operate their own linotype machines!" The mill men stated that very few children under twelve years of age were working in the factories, and very candidly admitted: "It's not a good business proposition—we can not obtain insurance on children under twelve." They did not state that the insurance premiums were deducted from the pay envelopes of the employes. The advocates of the bill were given an opportunity to present their views on Tuesday, July 18, and so well and ably did they acquit themselves it must have been made plain to any unbiased auditor that the report of the committee will undoubtedly bear the stamp of approval. And in this connection it might be well to add that Hon. Madison Bell, of Atlanta, who introduced the bill in the house, is chairman of the committee. Further comment is unnecessary.

First Vice-President John W. Hays, after spending several weeks in Atlanta, directing the campaign of organization in this city and vicinity, has left on a tour of cities in the southeastern jurisdiction. His route includes Columbus, Macon, Jacksonville, Savannah, Augusta, Charleston, Columbia, Charlotte, Raleigh and Richmond.

The eight-hour committee of Atlanta No. 48 is making elaborate preparations for the entertainment of the delegates to the southeastern eight-hour convention, which convenes in this city August 28. All unions in the district are again urged to have representatives at this meeting. President Lynch will be invited to be present, and it is certain he will accept unless very important business demands his presence at headquarters at this time.

The eight-hour and organization committees are very active at present, and everything possible is being done looking forward to putting into effect the successful operation of the eight-hour day. And there will be no let-up.

C. C. Houston (x-Detroit) will be among the visitors to the Toronto convention.

"Pete" McAllister, well known in many cities, desires his many friends to know that he has finished his apprenticeship and is now the proud possessor of a full card. In these days, when we read about "Where Are the Future Printers to Come From?" news of this sort ought to be refreshing to the membership and lend encouragement to the boys around the office, who, in most cases, seem to have no ambition to perfect themselves in the "art preservative."

Let everybody join in the chorus—"Organize!"

W. S. WARDLAW.

BELLINGHAM, WASH.

H. E. Steele, formerly of Seattle, and recently of Wenatchee, is showing up on the Herald.

At our last meeting a picnic for the membership and friends was suggested. A boat excursion to some of the islands was thought the better way of carrying the plans through, and a committee was appointed to make arrangements.

Fred Hudson, recently of Seattle, has accepted the foremanship on the Reveille, and has moved his family here. Mr. Hudson will make a good citizen.

We who live on the shores of Puget sound, and have, most of us, lived inland, can feel for you who remain inland when we go on Sundays for a yacht ride. It is great sport—better than horse and buggy or automobile—and is becoming more popular, as one of our members has gone so far as to invest in a fine boat. We all wish Mr. Selby many happy sails, and an invitation to join him in a day's outing will at any time be gladly accepted.

W. P. Dunton, who holds the head job on the American, got the right idea into his head and betook himself a wife last week. Mr. and Mrs. Dunton are at present enjoying a sojourn of a couple of weeks at the Portland (Ore.) exposition.

G. H. GRAY, Secretary.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

There is no telling to what means the employers will go to accomplish the defeat of the eight-hour movement of the International Typographical Union. At the last meeting of the union it was announced by President Calvert that it was a pleasure for him to see such an orderly and well-conducted meeting, and he commended the character of the work and the celerity with which the business was transacted, as he knew there were men there who would not hesitate to report every action of the union to members of the typothetæ. Can one conceive of any crime more dastardly or despicable than the betrayal of fellow workmen, which has been done on more than one occasion by miserable poltroons.

The fight against the unfair Inquirer still goes merrily on. The members have not lost their enthusiasm in the least and the organization committee is gaining confidence every week in the ultimate success of the strike. This paper is now being attacked by the other newspapers for the stand it takes in municipal affairs. It seems to be the Inquirer's policy to uphold everything that is low, mean and vile, and while this has been known to our members for some time, we are glad that it is being brought to the attention of the public through these influential mediums.

Edward W. Lawson, of Washington, D. C., foreman of the hand-set department of the government printing office, paid us a visit en route to his former home in New Jersey. About fifteen years ago "Whitey" worked in this city, and is well and favorably known here. F. C. Lampe, of Newark Union, also stopped over. He represented his union as a delegate to the St. Louis convention of the International Typographical Union. He is an enthusiastic eight-hour-day worker, and chairman of the New Jersey Eight-Hour Association.

By a comparison of the July JOURNALS of 1904 and 1905, announcing the list of delegates to International Typographical Union conventions, it is found that twenty-three delegates who represented unions at St. Louis will do the same at Toronto. This should facilitate business at the coming convention.

The Philadelphia delegation to Toronto should take some other route to that city than by way of Buffalo, as it is thought that city might be "dry" on account of the Elks' convention held there July 10-15. Everybody knows that this organization is the acme of good fellowship, and when it comes to entertaining it has no superior. Perhaps this may be due, in a measure, to having a number of printers among its membership. Those accompanying Philadelphia Lodge No. 2 to Buffalo were: W. H. H. Smith, known throughout the printing fraternity as "Billy"; Robert McWilliams and Robert A. B. Clements, well-known morning newspaper printers.

John J. Boote, for more than thirty years a member of No. 2, and who was a delegate to St. Louis in 1904, and who, for a great part of that time, was employed at Lippincott's, has taken out his card and deposited it with New York. John will be connected with the Delineator of that city, and, on account of his large and varied experience in the composing room of the Ladies' Home Journal, he will be a valuable adjunct to that magazine. Philadelphia Union will feel the loss of a man of Mr. Boote's caliber, as he was a thorough union man and an indefatigable and conscientious worker in behalf of No. 2. He has been treasurer of the organization committee since its organization three years ago. He was punctual in attendance at all meetings of the committee, and they have been numerous since this city began its perilous voyage toward organization, and his judgment in affairs pertaining to our welfare was eagerly sought by his confrères on the committee.

William G. McCarthy, at one time foreman of the Ledger ad room, visited his cousin, Charles Buecker—a member of No. 2—while spending his two weeks' vacation in this neighborhood. He is now in charge of the printing plant of one of New York's large insurance companies. While he acknowledges that New York is a fine city for work, the City of Brotherly Love, with its small dwelling houses, is the only city to live in.

The weather here was too hot for James Schofield, who came out of the Inquirer when it was declared unfair, and he has left for Lake Placid, in the Adirondacks. He went by train, it is thought, and it is rumored that he intends to spend his leisure time printing beautiful menus for the guests of one of the hotels there. It is hoped that by the time he returns the weather will be cool enough for him to resume operations here.

Washington Park-on-the-Delaware, where the central labor union held its Labor day demonstrations until 1903, when the place was declared unfair, on account of the proprietor's hostility to organized labor, has been reinstated to the patronage of union men, and the Labor day festivities for 1905 will be held there. This shows what can be done by union men by concerted action against their enemies, as this place was almost solely patronized by the working classes.

When the City Trust Company closed its doors and was put into the hands of a receiver, our union unfortunately was one of the depositors there, and although we have reason to hope for restitution it will take some time to close up the affairs of this institution. The amount deposited was $1,100.

Those who expect to attend the Toronto convention are beginning to look over their wardrobes and dig up the deposit book from the bottom of the trunk and inspect their account.

Israel Kurtz, of the old North American force when it was located at Seventh and Chestnut streets, is dead. He passed away at the Soldiers' Home at Hampton Roads, Va. This home has sheltered several Philadelphia printers at different times. John Evans is the latest to leave for that place, and at one time Aaron Burt and Charles Jones resided there.

Ernst Kreft was an attendant at the New Jersey state eight-hour meeting held at Somerville, that state. He says that everything looked favorable for the eight-hour day in that section.

The weather is extremely hot.

This is the zenith of the dull season. Temporary lay-offs seem to be the general order all over the city.

H. R. Stuart, a morning newspaper printer, has taken out his card and is going to seek pastures new in the great west. He is not sure where he will locate, but it will likely be where the grass is tallest.

William B. Fitzpatrick, in the short time he has been foreman of the Cecil Whig, Elkton, Md., has put the office on the eight-hour day working plan. He argued with the proprietor that the men would turn out as much work in eight as nine hours a day. After a trial the proprietor is entirely satisfied with the change.

It will be with pleasure that I anticipate meeting my fellow correspondents of THE JOURNAL at Toronto, and was pleased to see that the entertainment committee had set aside a night for the reception to correspondents. JOHN MEADE.

THE UNION BUTTON.

A very pertinent matter is in my thoughts and has occurred to me before, and, no doubt, has entered the minds of many other union printers: "Why is not the Typographical Union button more generally worn?"

It certainly is a badge of self-respect and honor; it is not without beauty, and it symbolizes in a great measure our advance from a former humble plane to our present high standard, mechanically, financially, morally, intellectually and socially.

Some may be ashamed to wear the button; others afraid to; again there are square (?) men who fear indigent brethren may "flag" the button and give a signal of distress.

A union man or woman should not be ashamed of the badge of his or her organization, nor afraid to wear it, and if every member of the International Typographical Union were to wear the button upon all occasions and show their principles every day instead of on only one day in the year (Labor day), unionism would be a more popular institution, as it would be brought into prominence continually.

I, for one, and others of my friends, are agitating the button idea. Success in some quarters has been good; in others indifferent, but why do not the rank and file of the International Typographical Union do the same?

I would like to hear opinions from members, and personally, as a union man, will welcome a button crusade. I think the matter worthy of consideration by the membership at large and urge the co-operation of our members.

NEW JERSEY EIGHT-HOUR COMMITTEE.

The following are the proceedings of the New Jersey eight-hour committee for June and July, which I am instructed to insert in THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL:

JUNE.

Meeting called to order by President Lampe, at Rahway, N. J., June 18, 1905.

By Halstead, Somerville No. 628—That officers of the New Jersey eight-hour committee communicate with President Lynch in regard to organization work, naming towns needing the services of an organizer and requesting a special organizer to assist Organizer McLoughlin. Adopted.

By Forbes, Jersey City No. 94—That a resolution of confidence in Organizers McLoughlin and Woodrow be sent to President Lynch. Adopted.

Resolution offered by F. C. Lampe, Newark No. 103:

Resolved, That we urge our respective unions to adopt resolutions forbidding any of our members to do any work coming from a jurisdiction where the local union is on strike for the shorter workday, or in case the proprietors should, prior to January 1, 1906, endeavor to force the issue by locking out its employes, without the consent of the local union affected. Adopted.

A resolution by F. C. Lampe, of Newark No. 103, deprecating the action of St. Louis Union in accepting a nine-hour contract, and endorsing the position of the executive council of the International Typographical Union, was adopted.

After a resolution of thanks to Rahway Union No. 235 for its hospitality the meeting adjourned to meet July 16, at Somerville, N. J.

JULY.

Meeting called to order by President Lampe.

Delegates present from Rahway No. 235, Elizabeth No. 150, Trenton No. 71, Jersey City No. 94, Newark No. 103, Somerville No. 628, Camden No. 132, Atlantic City No. 377, Plainfield No. 399, Union Hill No. 110, Easton (Pa.) No. 258, Philadelphia No. 2.

Reports of eight-hour committees:

Rahway No. 235—Are striving hard to get eight hours.

Elizabeth No. 150—Have signed agreement for eight hours through the efforts of Organizer McLoughlin.

Jersey City No. 94—Are enthusiatic in their demand for eight hours.

Newark No. 103—Have strong defense fund for eight hours, exclusive of the assessment.

Trenton No. 71—Are confident that they will succeed in their demand for eight hours.

Somerville No. 628—Will succeed if outlying towns are organized.

Camden No. 132—Only one office fighting the eight-hour movement.

Atlantic City No. 377—Have signed three agreements through Organizer Woodrow.

Plainfield No. 399—Confident to succeed in their demand for eight hours. One employer absolutely refused to affiliate with the typothetæ.

Union Hill No. 110—Positive they will receive eight hours on January 1, or, if possible, before.

Easton (Pa.) No. 258—Progressive; wide awake since President Lampe, of the New Jersey eight-hour committee, visited them. Hot after eight hours and will fight to succeed in their demand.

Philadelphia (Pa.) No. 2—Will fight for eight hours to a finish. Two members discharged for refusing to sign an individual agreement. Have a 55 per cent union and the strongest typothetæ.

Resolution introduced by K. M. Forbes, Jersey City No. 94:

"Whereas, It is the sense of this meeting that a special organizer, authorized to proceed throughout the state, with the purpose of organizing new unions or affiliating printers with unions in close proximity would be beneficial and provide an impetus to the general cause of unionism and the eight-hour movement, and

"Whereas, This organizer would be of inestimable benefit in bolstering up weak unions and organizing sections which, it is believed, would but need the presence of an organizer to affiliate.

"Resolved, That we petition President Lynch to take action, believing that it is unwise or inexpedient to depend altogether on all the local unions to carry on the work."

Adopted, and secretary instructed to send copy to President Lynch.

After passing a resolution of thanks to Somerville Union No. 628 for their entertainment the committee adjourned to meet in Foresters' hall, Atlantic and Indiana avenues, Atlantic City, N. J., on August 20, at 1 o'clock P. M.

P. W. VAN SKIVER,
West Hoboken, N. J. Secretary-Treasurer.

JERSEY CITY, N. J.

Success to the Toronto convention and eight hours!

The state eight-hour committee is holding meetings monthly. Recently meetings were held at Rahway and Somerville and quite a number of the cities throughout the state were represented. The next meeting will be at Atlantic City in August. Jersey City is represented at these meetings by Vice-President Allan Ball, Secretary Forbes and John Fisher.

Harry Winans, of Scranton, Newark, etc., has a sit. here with the American Type Foundry.

A bowling club is being organized by some of the members of No. 94, who intend challenging Newark and Elizabeth for a series of games. Any member desiring to join the club may do so by sending his name to Allan Ball, Journal office.

Secretary Kenneth M. Forbes carries the credentials to Toronto, and George W. Point, jr., to the Trenton meeting of the New Jersey State Federation of Labor.

The members of the Journal chapel are enjoying their annual vacation. Each member is given a week's vacation and paid for same by this enterprising paper.

Already candidates are in the field for the 1906 International Typographical Union convention.

No. 94 was never in better standing before in its history than today. Keep it up.

CHICAGO, ILL.

At this writing the situation in Chicago can be tritely described as quiescently normal. The restlessness preceding the expiration of the contract, July 1, has been followed by a more settled feeling that matters will continue peaceful until the conventions are over. There have been two little eruptions, one the request for the resignation of a foreman because he would not sign a two-year agreement, the other by reason of putting a non-union operator to work. The first was settled by continuing as a union office. The second was a lockout. It looked at first glance as though it was a plan to wage war one office at a time; but the typothetæ disclaims responsibility, insisting it is an individual matter. The foreman refused to sign for two years at an increase, and then the firm said they did not want him anyway. The second office discharged a boy because he refused to operate a monotype caster with non-union production of the keyboard, and then declared they intended to discharge him for other reasons. That was bad enough, but when the non-union operator was placed in the office, that was worse. The policy some firms pursue in discharging men, in reality for fidelity to union principles, under the thin excuse that it is for some other misdemeanor, reminds me of the parent who thrashed his seven boys in order to be sure of punishing the real culprit because he could not fasten the blame on any one in particular.

The organization work in Chicago and Cook county has been going on in a thorough and practical manner. Complete indexes were prepared at great labor and some expense, covering every printer in town. Ward clubs were organized, captains appointed, and meetings called, which were well attended. The work of canvassing the city was divided up so that every one who became interested was given something to do, and it is safe to say that personal visits and solicitation have been most satisfactory in results. One of the pleasing things has been the enthusiasm displayed by members of the union in the work, the volunteers being numerous and energetic. One peculiar phase developed was that a large number of those who have been listed as printers turned out to be pressmen, feeders, bookbinders, or men who had small offices, doing their own work, and boys who were apprentices. The investigation has materially reduced the estimated number of printers outside the union. Chairmen's meetings are held every Monday night, where experiences and general information are disseminated. There is hardly a night but what there is something going on with a view to preparation for the struggle. If other localities have been as active as Chicago in the work, the results will be satisfactory; if they have not, they should pattern after the live ones here and get busy. Every man taken into the fold is another nail driven into the nine-hour coffin, and every rusty or crooked nail should be gathered up, no matter how insignificant. The work has been so thoroughly penetrating that some amusing incidents have come to light. Where there have been duplicate names in the lists, or more than one man of the same name, union members have been solicited to join their own organization. All of which goes to show that Chicago has hunted every hole and corner for those who are likely to make trouble. Chicago has been undergoing the work of organization of non-union printers in preparing for the eight-hour day, and all other questions of politics and disagreements have been relegated to the rear until this one great, predominating, preeminent matter has been settled.

I do not believe it is generally known that the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union has started agitating the eight-hour day. At the Cincinnati convention resolutions were adopted ordering the board of directors to take steps toward negotiations with the typothetæ to that end, but not to conflict in any way with the existing agreement, which, by unanimous consent, was to run its course. The resolutions were sent to Edwin Freegard, at that time secretary of the typothetæ, under date of January 13, 1904, by Martin Higgins, president of the pressmen's organization. Freegard acknowledged receipt of the letter, stating he would lay the matter before his board. On February 25, having received no reply, Higgins addressed Mr. Macintyre, the new typothetæ secretary, stating in effect the same matter, and Mr. Macintyre acknowledged its receipt, promising to bring the matter to the attention of the typothetæ. April 13 Higgins gave Macintyre another punch on the subject, and in reply was informed the question had been laid before the executive committee at Kansas City, and it was their unanimous opinion that it was not in the province of that committee to legislate on matters so far in the future, and also disclaiming any authority to bind their successors in office to any outlined policy. Mr. Higgins, in his reply, states he is disappointed at the stand taken by the executive committee of the typothetæ, after being informed that it would go to the United Typothetæ convention to be passed upon, and further, in a sarcastic vein of mind, expresses his regret at so small an answer after so long a wait. Mr. Higgins takes the stand that the existing agreement expiring May 1, 1907, does not prohibit the pressmen from taking steps looking to a shorter day and anticipating the future by mutual conferences. I understand the San Francisco convention, just held, passed resolutions directing the officers of the union to open negotiations with the typothetæ for an eight-hour day at the expiration of the contract in 1907, and in the event of the refusal of the typothetæ to entertain any such proposition, the officers were further instructed to agitate. There is a heap more trouble ahead for the chill-blooded typothetæ. Higgins appears to be a rabid eight-hour advocate. He tears the proceedings of the eastern meeting of the typothetæ to shreds by playing the "resolves" against the "whereases" adopted at that time, and shows where they interlock and destroy the logic each of the other.

The allied printing trades council of this city has inaugurated a campaign of renewed activity. Some of the affiliated unions, notably the foreign-speaking trades, have grown listless and indifferent, and it is proposed to revive their interest by sending committees to the several bodies, explaining the need of loyalty in times of peace so as to be ready for war—carry the big stick, as it were. The seats of the delegates who had been prominent by their absence were declared vacant, and notices ordered sent to the various unions that delegates were wanted who would attend the meetings and assume some of the labor of carrying on the work. The organization has been a powerful factor when conducted on consistent and conservative lines, and should not be allowed to become obsolete.

The garbled and distorted accounts of interviews and proceedings of labor bodies appearing in the daily press are no credit to the newspapers involved, and are certainly detrimental to the cause. One often wonders how that great factor, public opinion, can so often diagnose conditions correctly when the source of information is considered, and acknowledged to be unreliable. I presume there are numberless people who have been conversant with the facts in some happening of greater or less import who have commented on the inaccuracy displayed by the newspapers in the published accounts. A recent case came under observation which shows the need of calmness and circumspection in the present situation. The Daily News recently quoted A. R. Barnes as saying the "employers would insist during July and August upon a three-year contract with the nine-hour day;" that a rival organization to the union was to be formed, intended to drive the union out of business; that E. R. Wright, president of the national eight-hour convention of the typographical union, had sent out a circular asking employers for a temporary agreement until January 1 next. Mr. Barnes telephoned to Mr. Wright that he had not been interviewed by a reporter, and had made no such statements at any time. Certain it is the interviews between Mr. Barnes and union representatives at different times bear out his telephone message in preference to the newspaper report. Then again, Mr. Wright is not president of the national eight-hour convention of the typographical union. He is president of the Central District Printers' Association, comprising only what are called the middle states. A reporter for the Record-Herald, scenting "a story," rushed over to the union rooms, expecting to get a sensational threat or reply, but when calmly given a few facts, retired, and no interview appeared in the Record-Herald. Then the American, the one paper in all Chicago the printers should expect to be truthful in labor matters, on a later date had a sensational article which had not a word of truth in it, except, possibly, that there was a typographical union and an association of employers called the typothetæ. It should be thoroughly understood by the members of No. 16 that scare-head articles in the newspapers are evidently meant to create misunderstandings more than to give reliable information, and should be given doubtful consideration. Whether labor reporters who carry union cards commit those indiscretions of their own volition or under instruction is a question that might well be a subject of inquiry.

The American and Examiner scale has been signed, sealed and delivered. When the matter was handed to the scale committee it appeared like an easy task, but in fact has proven one of the hardest nuts to crack that committee has encountered. That old sore, the sacrifice of principle by surrendering control of the supplement for two or three dollars per week, produced more proud flesh than the committee could find caustic to burn out, but the committee took the final stand that it was too late to consider the principle as applied to that particular office—it had been sacrificed five years ago, when the American scale was first made—and it was time the union took a practical and experienced view of the subject and treated it accordingly. The action of the union in endorsing the position of the committee, it is to be hoped, will be the end of a controversy inside the union that has caused much accusatory discussion. The policy of penalizing a friend of labor, who is not only a friend in theory, but also a friend in the substantial things that go with life, is altogether too narrow for a broad-minded organization to follow, and the union pursued a praiseworthy course in adopting the new scale without a dissenting voice. I believe the American scale is the best newspaper scale in the world—$27 and $30 flat for day and night work of seven hours, six and one-half hours for the lobster shift, and a 50-cent bonus for extra men, is a Utopian achievement scarcely dreamed of in hand-set days, actual hours and wages considered. There are higher scales, but the disadvantages of living outside the pale of civilization more than offset the increased pay by higher prices. Dawson, Y. T., has a scale of $62 per week for fifty-three hours; Butte, $33 and $30 for morning and evening papers of forty-five hours; Great Falls, $33 and $30 for forty-eight hours; Helena, $33 and $30, forty-eight hours; Anaconda, $33 and $30, forty-five hours; Manila, $36 and $30, forty-two hours; Virginia City, $35 and $30 for fifty-four hours; Nome, weekly papers, $36 for fifty-four hours.

The delegates to the convention of the state allied printing crafts, recently held in Peoria, report a businesslike session. The eight-hour day was endorsed some more, the International Typographical Union officers congratulated on their efficiency in conducting the campaign, the open shop received another dose of condemnatory resolutions, a monthly correspondence bureau was established to enable state officers to keep in close touch with all subordinate unions, with a recommendation that all unions assist in making it a clearing-house of information throughout the territory. Expression was made condemning the policy of some delegates in befouling the work of the association when a little concerted action would improve its usefulness. One of the tasks proposed was the equalizing of wage scales. Eugene Linxweiler was endorsed for expert state printer, and the selection of officers resulted in re-electing W. W. Clark, of Chicago, president; Walter S. Bush, of Peoria, for vice-president; and John A. Onyun, of Peoria, who has held the office of secretary-treasurer since 1893, was also re-elected. Peoria was chosen for holding the next convention, because of its central location.

Organizer Michael Colbert, who has been on an extended tour of the state in the interests of the International Typographical Union, reports a promising outlook throughout his territory.

L. D. Waltemade (Kaintuck), in a letter to a Chicago friend, expresses exultant satisfaction at the improvement in his health, says the Home is the finest place he ever saw, and incidentally warns his correspondent not to believe any fish stories from Colorado Springs, as there are some people born and raised there who never saw a live fish.

Henry Rush Boss, printer, proofreader, author and compiler, whose contributions frequently appear in THE JOURNAL, and which are evidently widely read, judging from the comments they elicit, celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his marriage July 10. Mr. Boss is one of the oldest and best known readers in Chicago. For years he was the authority in Culver, Page, Hoyne & Co., later the John Morris Company. He came to Chicago in February, 1861. Mrs. Boss was Miss Sarah Melissa Evry, and they were married in Fredonia, N. Y., July 10, 1855. Mr. Boss is one of the originators of the Chicago Society of Proofreaders, and has compiled and published works touching on that subject. He has also devoted much time to oldtime printer reminiscences for the benefit of the Historical Society and the Old Time Printers' Association. Although past the threescore and ten mark he is still as handy with the pencil as ever, and his many friends in this city would, if possible, wish him another fiftieth anniversary.

John C. Harding, for the past six years recording secretary and organizer, an ex-president and ex-delegate, has been appointed a member of the board of education to succeed George J. Thompson as the representative of labor on the board. A singular coincidence. John succeeded George Thompson as organizer of the typographical union and now succeeds George Thompson on the board of education. But the last Thompson is a cigarmaker.

Edward Conihan, an old Inter Ocean typo of thirty years ago or more, died in this city and was buried in the union lot at Elmwood cemetery. He was seventy-six years of age and has been out of the business for some years.

Henry W. Dewitt, better known as Harry, who was considered one of the crack jobbers of Chicago and for years an employe in Poole Bros.' office, died at the Union Printers' Home June 29. I am informed the interment was in the Home cemetery.

C. M. Wilson, late foreman of Hearst's Chicago papers, left for New York to take charge of the Journal. J. P. Stringer succeeds Mr. Wilson in the Chicago plant.

William Emmet Dennis, of the Chronicle, well-known in Chicago as secretary of St. Cecelia Lodge, F. and A. M., a singer and all-round royal fellow, was married June 17 to Alpina M. Higgins.

D. C. Shelly is no longer connected with the monotype headquarters of this city. He is succeeded by E. P. Jennings, jr., formerly of New York "Big 6," and more recently of Olean No. 345. It was my fortune to spend an instructive hour with Mr. Jennings in the monotype room of the H. O. Shepard Company recently.

The ex-delegates' headquarters will be open for entertainment of those who stop over in Chicago on August 10 at the Briggs House parlors, where a committee will be on hand for imparting information.

GEORGE J. KNOTT.

DALLAS EIGHT-HOUR MEETING.

An eight-hour conference of Texas typographical unions was held in Dallas on Monday, June 19, in response to a call issued by No. 172, of San Antonio. It was a success from every standpoint, twelve cities being represented by delegates, of which number two, Austin and Ft. Worth, are now working eight hours; one, Waco, eight hours and fifteen minutes; and one, Greenville, has signed an eight-hour contract, effective January 1, 1906. R. F. Radley, of Dallas, was elected chairman, and Chat McLaughlin, of Austin, secretary. Each delegate came armed with a statistical report of conditions in his city. These reports show in detail the name and number of job offices, journeymen and apprentices employed, how many belong to typothetæ, number non-union journeymen, offices that will grant eight-hour day, amount of eight-hour assessment, etc. A tabulation of these reports show that in eleven cities and towns there are 441 union journeymen employed and fourteen non-union men, mostly employed on small newspapers; there are ninety-four apprentices in these towns. There are 102 job offices, of which seventeen are members of the typothetæ; thirty-nine have signified their intention to grant the eight-hour day. There is now in the treasury of local unions to credit of defense fund $2,297, and it is estimated that this will be increased to more than $6,000 by January 1. Statistics from Fort Worth are not included in these figures, as that town now has the eight-hour day. In the matter of defense fund assessment, San Antonio leads with $1,400, and announces that it will have $4,000 by January 1. This union is collecting an extra assessment of 3½ per cent on earnings for the defense fund. A telegram was sent congratulating the executive council and the craft generally on the right solution of the St. Louis incident.

Among the resolutions adopted was the following:

Be it resolved, That a state campaign committee be appointed whose duties shall be as follows:

1. To collect and disseminate through local unions information relative to the progress of the eight-hour movement in Texas;
2. To cultivate the friendship and good will, and, if possible, the co-operation of country proprietors;
3. To organize and maintain an intelligence department for securing information and disseminating the same where it will do the most good;
4. To work out plans for having the public printing of Texas counties and cities done in union offices, and to that end cultivate the friendship and good will of the farmers' union;
5. The cost of maintaining the work of this committee to be raised by voluntary contributions of the unions represented in this conference and such others as may be induced to join in the work.

The following were appointed on this committee:

Walton Peteet, San Antonio, chairman; R. F. Radley, Dallas; Fred E. Horton, Greenville; Walter Nail, Houston, and Robert A. Higgins, Ennis.

Other resolutions were adopted as follows:

That a series of eight-hour rallies be held in all cities;

That each union appoint a label committee and begin active agitation along this line;

That the International Typographical Union be urged to give special attention to educational and organizing work among printers in small towns;

That it is the sense of the conference that no reduction be made in scale to secure eight hours;

That a referendum vote be taken on establishing a state typographical union;

Pledging support to St. Louis Union in its fight for eight hours;

That in the event the proposition to organize a state union is carried, that it meet in Houston some time during the fall, or in the event the proposition is lost that another state conference be called at that time.

The proceedings of the conference were enlivened by many entertaining, instructive and encouraging talks by delegates and invited guests. The general trend of remarks was that the outlook is encouraging, and that the conference had been of much value.

The delegates were entertained by the Dallas Union in a splendid manner with a trolley ride over the city and a picnic at Handley, a beautiful suburban resort. WALTON PETEET.

San Antonio, Texas.

NOTES FROM THE UNION PRINTERS' HOME.

W. J. Johnston, of No. 79; David Talbott, of No. 6, and Barnard Delaney, of No. 182, all residents of the Home, made an unusually quick tramp to the summit of Pike's Peak, in spite of difficulties, June 21, making the round trip at the average rate of two miles an hour. Six miles were traveled through dense storm-clouds, rain, wind and hail. James H. Martin, of No. 49, also a Home resident, though not a "party of the first part," followed the trio, rested at the Halfway House, visited the printing office of the "Pike's Peak News," and afterwards climbed to Windy Point, two miles farther up, and reached an elevation of 12,233 feet. Here Jimmy found "land too high" and the weather too cold for risking a farther advance. While returning he fancied himself investing his surplus cash in a gigantic windmill to run the cog road cars, if he could persuade the company to take stock in it instead of the contemplated electric powerhouse. He says there is enough wind power up there to "run anything." Comrade Johnston gives the following thrilling account of the trip.

"At a point about five miles from Manitou we entered the clouds while a terrific thunder storm was in progress, rain pouring down upon us until we were drenched to the skin, with no possible means for shelter. That circumstance, however, made no difference, as the atmosphere was so damp that it would have 'soaked' us through without the rain. The thunder and lightning was terrific. A flash of lightning would occasionally blind us and send a cold chill of fear down our spinal column, followed in a few seconds by a crash that sounded like the collapse of a 'sky-scraper' right at our backs. We would involuntarily throw our arms over our heads to protect ourselves from an imaginary stray brick. We enjoyed (?) these delightful sensations for about half an hour. A short time after the rain storm ceased, we encountered a heavy snow storm. The 'flakes' of snow and ice were about the size of a nickel, and when one of them came in contact with an exposed portion of our person we were forcibly impressed that something had hit us. Later on we ran into a lighter hail storm, which continued until we reached the summit of the Peak, wet through all our clothing and chilled to the marrow. The greatest drawback to our tramp was that we were deprived of a view of the grand scenery that the summit of the Peak affords, as we were in the midst of the clouds and could not see an object fifty yards away."

The round trip embraced over eighteen miles, and the height of the mountain is 14,142 feet. None of the party (all old typos) suffered any serious physical results from their cold and "soaking" journey.

A. U. Mayfield, a well-known Colorado writer, gets off the following squib, which may be of interest to unions who send sick members to the Home too late, or think the "climate will cure everything": "Some people come to Colorado expecting the climate to grow a new lung, put action into their sluggish heart, take the bow out of their legs, grow hair on their bald head, remove freckles, oil up their joints and reduce their age 30 per cent, and then sleep at night with the windows down and a rag stuffed in the keyhole for fear the climate will get at them."

Charles M. Carter, a prominent member of "Big Six," and who became a tuberculosis patient in the hospital annex May 24, 1904, recently vacated to fill a lucrative position in the Colorado Springs water department. We congratulate Mr. Carter on both his convalescence and appointment.

L. F. Miller, member of Lansing Union No. 72, en route to Everett, Wash.; George H. Patton, of Manila (P. I.) Union No. 626, accompanied by his wife; F. A. Sutton, of Hutchinson (Kan.) Union No. 243, and R. Hapgood and son, Bradford (Pa.) Evening Star, were among our visitors in June.

Albert O. Taylor, for several years chief engineer at the Home, has resigned to accept a position in the Portland reduction mill, south of Colorado City. He was succeeded by W. H. Blanchard.

H. W. DeWitt, admitted from Chicago No. 16 last January, died in the hospital annex June 27, from catarrhal affection of the stomach. The funeral services were conducted at the Home by Rev. E. Evans Carrington, and the interment was made in our plat at Evergreen cemetery.

We had a miniature fire June 29, which burnt up a roofless shack in the rear of the main building, where refuse and rubbish were temporarily deposited. Though a strong wind was blowing at the time, our fire department speedily subdued the flames after the adjoining coal house had been slightly damaged. Loss trifling.

Superintendent Deacon recently took a week's trip to Chicago, Columbus (Ohio), and other eastern points. He went via Pueblo, and took charge of an insane printer who had been previously consigned to a sanitarium. Mr. Deacon took the unfortunate man with him and placed him in charge of friends.

Charles L. Lindenberg, admitted to the hospital annex May 5, from Richmond (Va.) Union No. 90, died July 3, of consumption of the lungs. The funeral services were conducted by Rev. Mr. Carrington in the assembly room, and the interment was made in the Home plot of Evergreen Cemetery.

The Fourth of July was celebrated at the Home by a grand barbecue, baseball, and prize contests, and with brilliant fireworks in the evening. About 600 people, including residents, invited typo guests, their families and friends, partook of the ox-roast and accompaniments which were spread on long tables under a roof canvas. Mr. and Mrs. Deacon did their utmost to make the festivities enjoyable, and succeeded admirably. The contests resulted as follows: Seventy-five-yard dash, visiting printers —Bert Watson, Pueblo, box of fine cigars. Potato race, residents only—Frank Gutierez, pocket knife. Fifty-yard dash, women—Mrs. C. M. Carter, lady's silk umbrella. Smoking contest, home residents—Gutierez, first, winning box cigars; M. Connelly, second, tobacco jar. Shoe race, open to all—S. S. Bellesfield, Pueblo, pair of shoes. Running race, residents over sixty years old—M. Connelly, first, winning gold-headed ebony cane; R. Thompson, winning a cane. Potato race, women—Miss Grace Clements, bottle cologne. Running race, residents only—G. Forbes, first, box of cigars; Gallaher, second, pair of gloves. Smoking contest, open to everybody—Lucky Baldwin, first, winning box of cigars; G. Forbes, second, winning a pipe and tobacco bag. The ball game was a contest of picked nines of typos, with C. J. Gallaher, a resident from No. 16, as umpire. The line-ups: Pueblo—Honeywell, ss; Lewis rf; Watson, c; O'Brien, 3b; McDonald, 1b; Sloan, p; Curtis, cf; Young, 2b; Andrews, lf. Colorado Springs—Potts, Mitchell, c; McNeer, p; Caldwell, 2b; Wilson, 3b; Hunt, cf; Snider, 1b; Kirkpatrick, ss; Seigel, rf; Allen, lf. The score was 31 to 15 in favor of Colorado Springs. The barbecue and contests were especially enjoyed by residents who are confined to the Home by disabilities, and who have been unable to attend our annual picnic excursions.

Following is the list of arrivals and departures for No. 82 for June:

Cards deposited—Bert Beasley, Fort Collins; Henry Meyer, Pueblo; J. F. Kirkpatrick, Pueblo; C. C. Schuster, Salt Lake City; W. H. Kneck, Colorado Springs; J. G. Jenison, Colorado Springs; J. E. Carroll.

Cards drawn—Jos. M. Bishop, Miss C. P. Fincher, Walter Hoebel, J. G. Jenison, J. P. McAndrews, A. Schwisher, J. E. Carroll, W. H. Rueck.

A delegation of resident printers from the Home attended the funeral of Mrs. Taylor, of Emporia, Kan., mother of R. D. Taylor, of Colorado Springs, July 6. Mr. Taylor conducts a job printing office here, and is a member of No. 82.

Miss Laura Edinger, the Home bookkeeper, was recently called by telegram to the bedside of her sister-in-law at Columbus, Ohio, who was dangerously ill, but her relative had passed away before Miss Edinger reached her destination.

George A. Crowley, who was admitted from New York No. 6 in October, 1902, died from tuberculosis in the hospital annex July 9. His remains were buried in Evergreen Cemetery.

The news of the death of Charles O. Hull, of No. 6, was a great shock to his friends here. After being a resident of the Home about nine months, Mr. Hull vacated May 13 and returned to New York, with his health much improved, and felt able to resume work. Yet he was unable to survive an operation which he had to undergo a few weeks after arriving home.

Messrs. Weaver, Poland, McElliot, Beardsley and other residents attended the big Epworth League picnic at Stratton Park, July 12. There were about ten thousand people there.

Odillon E. Schupp, of Chicago, has left the Home and gone into business at Denver.

Carlos B. Tomlin, resident from Washington, D. C., for about twelve months, has resumed work at the trade in Colorado Springs. He was suffering from tuberculosis when he entered our hospital annex, but is now convalescent.

Captain Ed Sheffield says he entered the Home in 1902, not 1892, as printed.

John Ackerman, a resident from Indianapolis, was awarded first prize in the bean-guessing contest here on the Fourth—a silk umbrella. The number in the jar was 1,541; John guessed 1,535.

A. B. Stindle, of Atchison, Kansas, and Andrew Hughes, of Chicago, have become residents of our bountiful institution. O. LANGFORD.

FRESNO, CAL.

Fresno Typographical Union No. 144 and the local pressmen's union have organized a printing trades council, with A. C. Wrenn as president and W. Cochran as secretary.

The amount raised for the Cummings memorial fund was about $15.

During a debate as to the interpretation of one of the international laws, one of the members, laboring under undue excitement, arose and said: "Mr. President and fellow members, that's a rule that can be worked both ways; it's terra cotta."

There is at present quite a Denver colony working on the Democrat. Harry A. Huff, Charles H. Boughton and Harry Blumenthal, in the composing room, while T. E. McCracken, at one time pressman in the Denver News job office, has charge of the mailing department.

On June 1 the new scale went into effect in both news and job offices. Machine men on morning papers to receive $4.25, while floor men will receive $4, for seven and one-half hours. On afternoon papers machine men to receive $3.75 and floormen $3.50 for seven and one-half hours. This is an increase of 25 cents per day for machine men and 50 cents for floormen. Job printers receive an increase of $1 per week, which now makes their scale $19, eight hours per day. HARRY BLUMENTHAL.

THE LAY OF THE "FREAK."

The operator sat on his cushion of straw,
His linotype moved with a hum and a haw,
The elevator swung from the casting box jaw—
He caught it.

He was a "freak," and so would state
To his pals of a vastly slower rate,
And though his "mill" moved at a rapid gate—
He caught it.

He was working on "time"—his pay the same
As the slower operator minus the fame
Of this "freak," who worked to keep up his name—
He caught it.

The keys he'd hit at a rapid lick,
No time to linger, he must be quick,
The elevator had arrived at the stick—
He caught it.

His nerves unstrung, he grew snow-gray,
His youth had drifted fast away,
A "freak" he was in a by-gone day—
He caught it.

Nervous prostration to his lot fell—
The same old story, sad to tell,
He saw a sign: "This train for H—l."
He caught it.

REMINISCENCES OF TORONTO.

The holding of the International Typographical Union convention at Toronto brings to mind some reminiscences of the apprentice days of the writer, in the early sixties, in the office of the firm then known as W. C. Chewett & Co., located on King street west, near Yonge, and later known as Copp, Clark & Co. Messrs. Copp and Clark were both connected with the house while under the former firm name. The office maintained a regular staff of six apprentices—one graduated each year and a new recruit came in at foot of the list, with whom all the traditional initiatory practices were faithfully observed, including the entomological study illustrated in the July number of The Inland Printer.

Mr. Copp was best known to the apprentices as claimant of the title "Our Mawster." Mr. Clark, an active, energetic person, was entitled "Blazes," from the way he used to rush around. He would come into the office with some work, rush to the foreman's desk, give the instructions, and be out of the door and down stairs again before that worthy (Old "Baggs") would be alive to the fact that "Blazes" had been there at all. This foreman, while a worthy, respected citizen, by name William Edwin Brabant, was yet a testy old bachelor, who insisted on schoolroom discipline in the office, and no one was allowed to speak above a whisper. The result of this repression upon a pack of lively boys was that, during the noon hour, when the foreman and nearly all the hands went to dinner, all sorts of devilment was concocted to break the monotony.

Of the apprentices, the oldest was the writer's brother Tom, now deceased. Another was George S. Mill, brother of "Kicker" Mill, secretary of the Chicago Old-Time Printers' Society. Bill Sutherland did not serve his time out, but broke his indentures, came to Chicago, then went to Galesburg, and was last heard of in Virginia City, Nev., running an office of his own. One of the most active of the imps was Alfred Harcourt, who afterward went to Montreal to take charge of the printing and stationery department of a prominent Canadian bank.

Among the journeymen at that time, to whom we "cubs" looked for instruction, were William Henderson, a first-class printer, but not a strict temperance man, who one day was found drowned in Toronto Bay; William Cullin, who later went to Victoria, B. C., and for a number of years was secretary of that union; Frederick Fell, a thorough book printer of the old school, but an inveterate croaker, known in the shop as "Old Misery," and said to have allowed his wife a dollar a week to keep house on, together with what she could raise in the garden. Not to be forgotten was Isaac Ginn, a small-sized man, who endeavored to counter our twitting on his diminutive stature by emphatically informing us that he was "a married man, and father of a family." Then there was George Thomas, who had formerly been a member of the firm, but of whom we did not learn much. Messrs. Dudley and Burns, who afterward went into business for themselves, were also on the staff. But old John Gannon, a bachelor, of a gentle disposition, and whom we all loved, strange to say, was one upon whom we played several tricks. John's chief characteristic as a workman was his precise, methodical ways. In distribution, he laid all his type one way, so that his filled cases were as even as if just laid from an unbroken package of new letter. His "motion," in composition, was regular, steady, almost machine-like—no false moves—and with every reach of his hand a type came, right side up. To the uninitiated he looked like a slow old poke; but his string would lengthen out in a most mysterious way, and it was the height of our ambition to set as much and as clean a proof as old John. Occasionally John would relieve his legs by sitting down on a "peg," which oscillated to and fro with his regular motion. This gave Harcourt the idea of placing in the bottom of the peg a piece of brass rule with face protruding just enough to give a cutting edge. Soon the floor began to wear, as John always placed the peg in the same spot. We watched the wearing process with deep interest and looked forward to the time when the floor would be worn through, and the peg make its appearance through the ceiling of the stationery store below. But our anxiety defeated the project, as one day John caught the direction of our eyes, and, looking down, an amused expression overspread his kindly face. He looked around, shook his head, but said nothing, and next day he nailed a piece of tin over the hole. This experiment having failed, we next bored out a hollow space in the bottom of the peg and filled it with gunpowder, put in a fuse, plugged it, and laid a train of powder under his frame to the next alley, from whence it was fired by Harcourt when the foreman had gone out of the room. It was worth money to see the astonishment depicted on his countenance when he returned. The room was black with smoke. The old man was so puzzled he could scarce utter a word. Our faces were crimson. Old John was lifted a trifle, and that was all the damage that was done, except that John had to make a new peg. He was true blue, however, and gave us not away—he was a boy once himself. And we loved him still more. On another occasion we blew up his case, in the effort to destroy the beautiful "lay" of his type.

Our other pranks were mostly played upon "Old Baggs," and were all in the direction of furnishing him with that he most detested, namely, noise. Some of them required days of preparation. For instance, a chase bar was suspended between the rafters over the hand presses, and a hammer so adjusted and connected to a string that it could be operated by one of the boys at the front end of the shop. Again, a large potato was placed on the end of a stick, and arranged to beat on a hollow partition that when struck sounded like a big bass drum coming down the street.

On one occasion Sutherland took a brick from under the stove, carefully wrapped it in nice colored, drug-store-like paper, neatly addressed it to "William Edwin Brabant," and placed it on the old man's desk. On his return from dinner, "Baggs" picked it up, scrutinized the package and the handwriting, and at intervals repeated the operation until his curiosity led him to open the package. He closely examined it, smelled it, turned it over and over, and when Henderson next came up to the desk for a job, said: "Mr. Henderson, what do you call that?" Henderson replied, "Why, I should call that a brick." The old man's look of disgust as he called one of the boys to take it away was our reward.

But to tell all would make a volume, and this communication has already invited the blue pencil.

DELEGATES, ATTENTION!

The United Typothetæ having declared their intention to try and prevent the eight-hour day, it becomes the duty of all parties interested in securing it to make every effort possible to that end. We have ample evidence that the typothetæ is leaving no stone unturned to defeat the effort for a shorter workday, demonstrated by their action with No. 8, as well as tempting advertisements in different newspapers. Anything to break our ranks. One of their strongest weapons, and probably our greatest menace, is the isolated printer, whom they pay so much attention to, and whom we have so much neglected in the past; and we also neglect to enroll apprentices, as apprentices, to insure them beginning their career as union men. If prevention is better than cure, is it not better to prevent the aforesaid from being a menace than to try and control them after they become one, with a risk of not being successful? The question of the isolated printer is not a new one, but it has generally been avoided or evaded by local unions thrusting the responsibility upon the officers of the International Typographical Union, who are really unable to cope with it effectually, on account of its vastness, as well as the enormous expense that would be incurred by sending paid organizers into every locality where there are printers not affiliated with any union. The task can only be properly performed by each union attending to its own jurisdiction (the jurisdiction of a union is territory nearest to it), and the only security for this being carried out is to distinctly instruct the officers of the International Typographical Union to see that it is done by insisting that each union submit a report at stated periods, giving particulars of any and what action has been taken to that end.

There are members, with few exceptions, in every subordinate union who can reach, directly or indirectly, one or more non-union printers in every locality in their jurisdiction, and every one so gained can be made the medium for communicating with the rest, thus forming an endless chain.

As a remedy, I suggest the following, trusting that amendments will be made where thought necessary:

1. That each union shall take steps to initiate all non-union printers in its jurisdiction who have never worked against unionism. Those who have done so, or held previous membership, to be admitted according to terms agreed upon by the union. Also, that apprentices be admitted, as apprentices, free of initiation money after serving three years (on payment of 10 cents per month). When they are eligible to become journeymen they shall be granted a card of membership free if they enroll in their fourth year, be charged $2 if they enroll at the beginning of their fifth, and $3 if they enroll the last six months of their apprenticeship, after which, if they neglect to enroll, they will have to pay the regular initiation fee. All apprentice members to receive a copy of THE JOURNAL regularly, for which the local union will pay 5 cents to the International Typographical Union.

2. Admission free to non-union out-of-town printers. (I would suggest that no fee be charged.)

3. Dues, 25 cents per month (20 cents to International Typographical Union and 5 cents to local union). To continue until a union is formed in that locality, or he becomes a regular member of a subordinate union. Benefits—The regular death benefit of the International Typographical Union, a copy of THE JOURNAL regularly, and a traveling card on leaving, entitling him to admission to any subordinate union he may wish to enter.

4. That each subordinate union shall submit a monthly report of the condition of its jurisdiction to the officers of the International Typographical Union; penalty for neglect, $1, to be published in THE JOURNAL.

I believe there are many out-of-town printers, as well as apprentices, who would be glad of the chance to avail themselves of the above if they had the opportunity. The reduced charge in shape of dues is fully justified, because they would have no protection for their scale, which would be an incentive for them to organize, ultimately resulting in an increase of charters, as well as of revenue to the International Typographical Union. In addition, it would prevent them coming into town to take members' jobs—a benefit to be seen at a glance. With regard to apprentices, is it not better to have young journeymen than old apprentices, and is not a boy joining a union at the end of an apprenticeship more likely to become a better union man than one who neglects to, perhaps working in unfair houses? We can not deal with the question of competence at present. That must be left to the parties concerned. Many we might consider incompetent would be considered competent if required to fill a union man's job.

CONDITIONS LABOR FACES.

The inhabitants of any country are prosperous in proportion as its products are most thoroughly distributed. Where a few are able to produce more than they can consume, or to secure from the products of others a share larger than the equivalent they give in exchange, they sow the seeds of poverty and distress for some portion of the general community. This is due to labor's dependence upon capital. With full and permanent prosperity each individual would be able by toil to secure only the share of necessities and luxuries that was just. There would not then be any need for hoarding. To forestall criticism at this point, it may be well to say that this could not result in the extinction of self-denial. The health of the body and mental self-control will always require this virtue to some degree. But fear of future want could be banished altogether by means of insurance societies under either private or government control.

Today capital is the master of labor. The laws favor it and the judges take care of its interests. It must first have its "pound of flesh," though it be wrung from the hearts of the people and send multitudes to untimely graves. Capital creates child slaves, whose mirthless lives are limited to a very few years. And when any attempt is made to stop this evil, or to benefit labor in any way, the cry is raised that there is no "sentiment" about capital. The first and last question in the establishment of any branch of industry is whether capital can obtain a sufficient percentage for its investment. The higher the percentage, the smaller the proportion of its products that labor receives, and the nearer the toiler draws to actual slavery. Still capital is hailed as a public benefactor because it furnishes opportunity to labor.

Capital is neither producer nor consumer. Therefore, it must continue to grow more and more powerful if it be conceded that it has a right to compensation. A little of it will be wasted by its possessors. A little more will be given away, just as a man for his own pleasure may scatter pennies among the newsboys to see them scramble for the coins. Besides, these benefactions have some effect in lessening public clamor against the menace of excessive wealth.

One of the ways by which capital is occasionally wasted is by means of competitive business. Just as the weight of money seeking investment has forced down the percentage of interest on loans, so the field of business and industry becomes circumscribed and limited in opportunities. Hence any promising opening is grasped, and, in order to secure business, prices are cut and a war is precipitated which brings losses to capital. Then an effort is made to retrench by cutting down expenses. Men are discharged and their work is added to the labor of other employes. When these ask for better wages for increased toil, it is either refused or grudgingly made as little as possible. Should labor at this time (under the conditions capital has created) ask for reduced hours or for any improvement whatever, the employers feel themselves badly treated, and assert that capital must have its fair percentage, all the business incidentals (tangible and intangible) must be provided for, and the employers themselves should be given large salaries, before labor is entitled to any betterment whatever. What a hopeless prospect for labor is thus presented! And where is the promise of a brighter future? A proposition to reduce hours on the ground that the general welfare demands it is looked upon as sentiment having no weight against capital's claim to "just" compensation. Thus, while capital is itself responsible for its losses, labor's power of resistance is the measure of what it shall receive at such times, because competition endeavors to reduce the cost of labor in order to underbid rivals.

As already stated, the effect of guaranteeing that capital shall receive a percentage of profit, no matter how small, must give it constantly increasing power. On the other hand, labor's only chance of advancement lies through its ability to control capital, or to create capital for itself. The toiler must not only exercise constant self-denial in order to save a portion of his earnings, but must also be fortunate in not having it swept away through illness or lack of work or the dishonesty of others. To the extent that he is successful he joins the ranks of capital, and through capital must get some portion of the products of others' toil to secure anything like what is called independence. The employer, however, who possesses capital, with dividends fully secured, could also add to his capital from his large salary with little, if any, real self-denial. Is this perfectly fair?

The low moral tone of business which springs from capital without sentiment has been manifested by two special editorials in the Chicago Tribune. In the first it was asserted that no one could be honest and be successful. The second was entitled, "Dishonesty in Business Pays." These editorials have a vicious tendency. It is much better to believe with the editor of the Chicago Examiner: "The majority of laboring men are honest, as are the majority of business men." Still, testimony to the great prevalence of dishonesty in business is too general to be ignored. Hence it is pertinent to ask what right dishonest business men have to expect honesty from those they hire? To attain its ends, dishonesty must play the coward and hide its head. When unmasked, its deformed shape scares its would-be victims away. Labor can never hope for justice from those possessed by this demon except through compulsion.

Dishonest employers can only be kept in line by organization. It has been claimed that becoming a member of a labor organization is a surrender of liberty, and loyalty to it in time of trouble is an injustice to those dependent upon any member. In reality such membership gives greater independence and better conditions, and only by loyalty can the benefits of organization be secured. Thus honor and self-interest are combined by loyalty. The employer who believes membership in a labor organization is a surrender of liberty takes the same position as an anarchist who wants government abolished because laws prevent freedom. Herbert Spencer said: "Every man has freedom to do all that he wills, provided that he infringes not the equal freedom of any other man." It was for the preservation of real freedom that labor organization (which is a form of government) came into existence.

It is to extend the blessing of freedom from want and care that the unionist wishes the hours of labor reduced. The non-unionist would also like to have them reduced. The employer says he knows they will be reduced some time. Isn't it possible to lessen the hours of labor when there is so little difference of opinion? Crushing out unionism is a foolish and endless task. In trying to do this there have been frequent solicitations by employers of members of labor organizations to leave such bodies and to make individual agreements. Surely they know "ratting" is dishonorable, and how can they feel safe in employing one who is so lacking in principle? Agreements, to have any value, must be based upon honor. When the employer is dishonorable in procuring them and the employe dishonorable in signing, the result should prove unsatisfactory to both. Dishonorable and dishonest people are very likely to be hypocrites also. And the outcome of it all will be dissatisfaction, disaster and remorse. No one can escape the penalty for wrongdoing. "Ignorance of the law" of compensation and retribution "excuses no one."

Business here is pretty good, and the hot weather makes the boys continually call for subs, though there are very few to be had in town.

Burke & Gregory have installed a battery of monotypes, and though strangers at first, the fellows are gradually getting used to them.

W. S. Brady ("Old King Brady") will represent No. 32 at the International Typographical Union convention. We respectfully refer him to the woman's auxiliary, and ask them to be tender and merciful in their treatment of him.

George O'Neill, a familiar figure in many southern cities, has shown up in Norfolk again. No one knows where he came from, though the supposition is that he "dropped from the clouds."

The Virginia Pilot has added another "mill" to its battery of machines.

The Ledger, which is now under new management, is giving its afternoon rival a tussle. Both have taken on new life lately, and are getting out very creditable sheets.

Both the job and newspaper business is good here. There are no known idlers in town at present.

By all means, push the eight-hour movement along. E. F. MOORE.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

The June meeting of the union was held at "The Lookout," in the woods near Boyden Heights, East Providence. The place derives its name from the beautiful view obtained from it. About ten miles of the Providence river is visible, from the city on the north to Pawtucket on the south. It is reached from Boyden Heights by a forest path and is shaded by cedars. There was a large attendance of members, and general satisfaction was expressed at the change from meeting in a hot room in the city to the cool woods. The indoor work of the printer makes him peculiarly susceptible to that spot where > "The wind flows cool, the scented ground

> Is breathing odors . . ."

It was voted to appropriate the sum of $150 to pay the expenses of the delegates to the I. T. U. convention at Toronto, the money to be taken from the treasury. No extra assessment will be levied. Edgar O. Beasham, delegate to the recent convention of Allied Printing Trades of New England, held at Fall River, Mass., made his report. He had been elected a vice-president of that body. He reported that the allied trades would be active for the eight-hour day. For the auditing committee of No. 33, Mr. Beasham presented a printed report, showing the payments of each member of the union for the past year. The July meeting will also be held in the suburbs.

The first issue of the Journal in its new building was on June 19. The moving began at midnight, while the work of getting out the Sunday Journal of the 18th was in progress. The first linotype was in operation at about 10 A. M., having been disconnected for its journey about six hours before. By 1 P. M. the entire battery of eleven were in position and most of them in operation. The change in the measure to thirteen ems necessitated the resetting of everything for Monday's paper, and this work was not begun until the machines were in position. A 16-page Journal and a 28-page Bulletin were printed Monday. The composing room is splendidly lighted and ventilated. The foundation of the Journal building is in the style of a large, deep pan, entirely filling the 50x200-foot lot. The walls and bottom of the pan are of concrete, from seven to eleven feet thick. No solid foundation for this concrete body to rest upon could be found. The tide of the Providence river rises and falls beneath it, exerting a pressure against the bottom of the pan of about 6,000 tons. There is no danger of its floating away, however, unless climatic changes of an extraordinary nature should recur.

"The State," issued on Saturdays, "devoted to the cause of popular government," made its appearance June 17. It is dated in Providence, but carries the Pawtucket label.

Herbert W. Cooke, the able Boston correspondent, has an item in the July number of THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL to the effect that "William Grandison, the first colored man to become a member of a typographical union in this country, joined Cambridge Union No. 61, in 1870." He credits it to the Boston Globe. At the organization of Providence Typographical Union No. 33, in June, 1857, one of the charter members was Alexander P. Niger, a colored compositor. He remained one of its most valued members until the union surrendered its charter in 1878. He died in this city January 13, 1898, aged 68 years. It will be noted that Niger was an organizer of the union at a time when the question of the slavery of his race was at an acute stage.

Secretary Cantwell, of Worcester Union, was in town about the fourth of July. James F. Zimmerman, formerly of this city but now located in Norwood, Mass., spent his vacation here.

Mrs. Crofwell, the young wife of N. J. Crofwell, of the Bulletin linotype force, died suddenly July 7. Their marriage took place last November.

WILLIAM CARROLL.

IN ANSWER TO PRESIDENT ELIOT.

Charles W. Eliot, president of Harvard University, which institution exists ostensibly for the purpose of training the minds and expanding the intellects of its students in such manner as to properly fit them for their place in life, but which of recent years has become an incubator for the propagation of ideas hostile to American workingmen, again launches forth an article bearing upon the relations of the employe to the employer, in a late number of Harpers', and masks his tirade under the high-sounding caption of "Employers' Policies in the Industrial Strife." President Eliot draws his convictions on labor questions from the same source that he draws his salary, from the capitalistic class, and has about as much knowledge concerning the workings of labor unions as a Cree Indian has of stenography.

Mr. Eliot says that such policies as the "closed shop, the curtailment of output, the effort after a monopoly of labor, certainly do not meet with public approval." And, continues Mr. E.:

"What tests or criteria can we apply to the policies of the new employers' associations to discriminate the selfish from the unselfish policies, the policies which will prove acceptable to the community at large from those which will prove unacceptable? In the first place, whenever an association of employers shows that its effort is, after all, directed to the attainment of a monopoly, like the habitual effort of every labor union, it will certainly fail to command public confidence."

At the start Mr. Eliot assumes that organized labor's demand for shorter hours' work is an effort to curtail production. Now, to any man possessed of a well-balanced intellect the utter ridiculousness of this proposition is apparent. What could skilled or unskilled workmen gain by a curtailment of production? How would their interests be advanced by such a policy? Would not such a system be retroactive? Would it not result in fewer men being employed?

No, Mr. Eliot; your imagination has given birth to a bogey-man which can inspire terror only in the bosom of its progenitor. Certainly no man who has given this question intelligent thought will entertain this curtailment of production proposition for a moment. The shorter hours proposition will give to workingmen an opportunity for relaxation, social enjoyment, intellectual improvement, and also an opportunity to become acquainted with their families—a thing a ten or twelve hour day renders next to impossible. It will give employment to more men, and, per se, disposes of your accusation of monopolizing labor, "as is the habitual trend of labor unions." For if it takes four men six days at ten hours, or sixty hours, to do a piece of work, these same men, working eight hours, would make work for one more, and he would have forty-eight hours' employment, or one week, instead of being idle consequent upon a ten-hour day.

"Monopolies are no more welcome to the free people of the United States today than they were to our English ancestors four hundred years ago. The contest against monopolies granted by the sovereign for the profit of his government, or of his own purse, was one of the great steps in the development of public liberty."

Here is where the learned professor unconsciously endorses organized labor. The blanket-sheet monopolies granted by the government of the United States for the enrichment of a chosen few have made it more than ever necessary for the workingmen to organize in their respective callings. There is something radically wrong in a system of government that permits one man to accumulate, in the course of an ordinary lifetime, a fortune of hundreds of millions of dollars. No man can do this and do it honestly. Some one must suffer through his rapacity and greed, and usually his employes are the ones on whom the suffering is most intense. Hence the necessity for organization.

"The world has never before seen such elaborate or such successful efforts after the acquisition of monopolies as the last thirty years have witnessed under the free governments of the world, first on the part of bands of working-people, and secondly on the part of bands of capitalists."

Here, again, President Eliot shows that he is utterly unfit to discuss this labor problem, for his prejudices against organized labor will not permit him to pass an opportunity to knife it in the back. If he knows anything concerning the history of organized labor he knows that thirty years ago the list of organized trades with their international and national heads could almost be counted upon one's hand, and it was not until governmental patronage had made the capitalistic class drunk with excess of wealth and luxurious living, with utter disregard for the welfare of those whose labor created their wealth, that labor organizations came prominently before the public. Mr. Eliot must remember that the American workman is entitled to the same consideration that the American millionaire is vouchsafed, and the workman will make just as good looking an angel as the millionaire, and stands a heap better chance of being one, if the good book is authentic. But he is not dealing in futures, and wants his fair share of sunshine and happiness while he is yet among the living; he wants his children to secure an education; he wants his wife, the patient, silent partner of the firm, to secure her share of the enjoyment of life, to emancipate her from a life of drudgery, and he can not do this by permitting himself to remain a mere automaton. He must and will take his place, and his influence will yet be felt in shaping legislation that will bring about a more equitable adjustment of condition.

Mr. Eliot's defense of the strikebreaker is in keeping with his senile ideas concerning organized labor in general. Recruited from the scums of society, the strikebreaker is the born enemy to the human race. Of such were the thugs and thieves that Carnegie hired at $2 a day to shoot down the workmen who produced the wealth he is now building libraries with, for the sole purpose of erecting monuments to his memory. He needs no stone to perpetuate his memory. The widows and orphans he made are everlasting reminders of his stay on earth, and the green mounds in Homestead's cemetery will ever remain as silent but eloquent appeals to organized labor not to halt or falter in its effort to elevate its members and better their conditions. LABOR'S RIGHTS TO PROFIT.

Honest profit grows out of demand, not out of supply; out of the consumer's needs or desires, not out of those of the producer. The workman who produces a commodity does not produce the profit on it; nor does his employer. If either did, or both together, they would not need to sell the commodity; they could take the profit off and store the commodity down cellar.

At a point somewhere between what is expended in producing and selling a thing, and what it would cost the user to do without the thing or make it himself, lies honest profit—a measure of mutual and equal advantage in exchange, conducive to the progress of all concerned.

This principle may best be illustrated in the case of a machine used as a tool of production, as, for instance, in the following diagram, where A represents cost of producing and selling the machine, B represents the selling price (cost plus a share of profit), and C represents the productive value to the user of the machine, greater by five points than the selling price (B), which is his cost price:

A B C

0 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10

As the diagram stands there is a mutual advantage in the exchange; the manufacturer gains five points by it; the user gains five points. Should the selling price (B) be moved up to 6 the machine would be that much less profitable to the user, and with each succeeding forward step of B the profit to the user would decrease, until at last, when B stood at 10, there would be no profit for him in buying such a machine, unless he could raise the price of his product to the consumer above what it had been, consequently he would not buy the machine. To reverse the procedure: Should the manufacturer be compelled to reduce the price (B) of the machine to 4 in order to sell it he would lose 20 per cent of his profit, and with each succeeding backward step of B his profit would decline until, when B arrived at 0, his profit would cease, and if he desired to continue manufacturing machines at a profit to himself he would have to reduce the cost, and, reversing the natural order, take profit from production, from supply, instead of from demand.

At either end of this proposition lies unfairness, injustice. The consumer, however, is protected to some extent by competition; the purchaser of the machine himself need not buy unless it is to his advantage, therefore needs no protection.

The only person upon whom the manufacturer may fall to take profit, when his business is unprofitable in itself, is the workman engaged in producing the machine, who is not in any way responsible for the lack of demand, and consequent lack of profit. Had the manufacturer, when the selling price (B) was at 5, shared his profits equally with his workman it is quite evident that there would have been a de facto partnership, and he would have established a right to share his losses equally. But it is equally evident that the man who will not take partners in prosperity has no right to them in adversity.

Ricardo (Sec. IV, "On Value") says: "There can be no rise in the value of labor without a fall of profits," and then, to illustrate, he states a fact which analyzes his fallacy: "So, if cloth or cotton goods be divided between the workman and his employer, the larger the proportion given to the former, the less remains for the latter." The supposition apparently is that profit and cloth are manufactured at the same time by labor and machinery. If that were the case the employer could tear off the profit and trade the rest to the junkman for bottled beer, to drink success to the man who invented a way to take profit without customers. As stated above, honest profit grows out of demand, not out of supply. Profits do not fall with a rise in the price of labor; the rise divides them between employer and employe. It is a new deal, that is all; an advance toward the "square deal," to which President Roosevelt says we are all entitled.

It was Parry who enunciated the proposition that "Labor unions are a tax on profits." If Parry would advertise his buggies more and his ignorance less he would discover that profit comes out of demand, not out of supply.

Honest profit is not a tax on anything except wealth unproductively employed. It takes from no man more than he can afford to give with profit to himself. Profit taken from wealth productively employed (capital) is loss; when taken against the will of the owner of the capital it is robbery.

Adam Smith, in analyzing the fixed capital of a nation in his "Wealth of Nations," says it consists of (1) useful machines and instruments of trade; (2) of profitable buildings; (3) of improvements of land, and "fourthly, of the acquired and useful abilities of all the inhabitants as members of the society. The acquisition of such talents, by the maintenance of the acquirer during his education, study or apprenticeship always costs a real expense, which is a capital fixed and realized, as it were, in his person. Those talents, as they make a part of his fortune, so do they likewise of that of the society to which he belongs. The improved dexterity of a workman may be considered in the same light as a machine or instrument of trade which facilitates and abridges labor, and which, though it costs a certain expense, repays that expense with a profit."

This, though not so stated by Mr. Smith, is the basic form of capital. All other forms of capital are tools to be used by brains and ability, and in the last analysis the proposition reduces itself to brains as the basic form of capital. The workman's hands and feet are merely tools to be used by his brains. Cultivated brain is the great fixed capital, and every man who uses his brains for the good of society is entitled to take profits in the ratio of the productive value of his capital to that of the whole society. This may sound like socialism, but it is not socialism. It is the analysis of the reasons why the statement of Mr. Jarrold, of Binghamton, "Labor is entitled to all it produces," is true. It is the theorem of the piecework scale: "From every man labor according to his ability; to every man profits according to his labor." It says that a college professor's salary ought to be larger than that of a bar-tender, not because his labor is physically more difficult, which it is not; but because it is more profitable to society, which it is.

Labor is profitable to society in exact proportion to the capital employed,—which is a very broad proposition, and as its analysis will show why we are entitled to shorter hours in the handwork departments it will have to wait until the editor can give me more space. The capital is brains.

MANISTEE, MICH.

The state of trade has been excellent during the past month; every member seeking work has been employed, but little encouragement is given by the small-shop proprietors for the change on January 1.

The eight-hour committee is not discouraged. It has been in battle; has learned the sentiments of the employers; has canvassed the situation with becoming gravity, and has endeavored to effect an amicable arrangement for the inauguration of the eight-hour day on January 1. The committee was met in all fairness by the employers; was treated with due consideration, and left expressing high admiration for the sentiments expressed by the employers. Manistee has been a lumber town, and is now in that transitionary stage when lumber gives way to other enterprises. In the printing trade the first effects of a decrease in population are felt by a slacking up of the income. One or two of the shops have been running at a loss for several months, endeavoring to keep their employes all on the pay roll in the hope that a bright rift might appear in the clouds soon, and they could again get on the road to prosperity. It was on account of this condition that Manistee is not at present included in the number of towns which enjoy an eight-hour day. However, we are assured it, if conditions are such that the change can be made without hindrance to business, at an early date. The proprietors acknowledge the eight-hour day as the logical workday, and realize that some day all trades will be enjoying its benefits. That they can stretch the ends of their business to grant the 11¼ per cent decrease in hours on the 1st of January has been their expressed hope.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.

No. 104 installed its officers, elected for the ensuing semi-annual term, at the last regular meeting, they being G. V. Hess, president; Carl Sumner, vice-president; J. M. Russell, financial secretary (re-elected); T. T. Nock, recording secretary (re-elected); James Kelly, sergeant-at-arms (re-elected for the 'steenth time). The roster of the appointive offices has not yet been made up, but no doubt will show that No. 104 will continue "safe and sane."

Work has been fairly good here, both as to newspaper and job offices, though the complement of "subs" has nearly always been equal to the demand.

The News has been running a one-machine night shift since the baseball season opened. The ball edition goes out at 7 P. M.

Our delegate, T. T. Nock, who has the unique distinction in this union of having been elected without opposition, is arranging an itinerary for his trip to Toronto that will include some side trips in search of relatives he has never seen. It is usually pleasanter to hunt up relatives than to have them hunt you up, but as Mr. Nock hasn't more than half a dozen all told, we wish him all success.

Bob Shields, who has a machine on the News, was summoned to Wichita, Kan., recently by the severe illness of his baby son. He is back now and is arranging to bring his family here, as he is pleased with Birmingham.

A recent meeting of No. 104 passed a "regulation ordinance" to apply to the Age-Herald machine operators. The Age-Herald, by option of the management, is now on a piece scale, and the boys got to grinding out six days' pay in five days (measured by the time scale), so by resolution the union cut the maximum week from forty-two to thirty-five hours, and—everybody satisfied (?).

On June 15 another fifteen minutes was taken off the workday in the newspaper offices here, as per agreement, and by this process these offices will be down to the eight-hour basis on December 15 next. Our eight-hour committee is earnestly at work, and we do not anticipate any trouble in the job offices, as it is fast dawning upon the astute business mind that, measured in dollars and cents (not to presume to ethical considerations), there is more in the eight-hour day than can be gotten from the nine-hour day.

The machine is a magnet that draws business. A few months ago the Ledger put in two additional machines, increasing its battery to five. The intention was to put one on job-office work and the other to help out the paper run on busy days. The result is, both are now considered regulars on the daily paper run.

No. 104 has nearly reached the century mark of membership, and while perhaps there have been times when more cards were accountable to it, the present strength has never before been so long maintained.

Walter Hill, one of No. 104's ex-presidents, has gone to Vancouver, B. C., where he will hold down a machinist-operator job.

Ex-Delegate R. P. Schoppert has been elected No. 104's delegate to the southeastern eight-hour conference, to be held the 28th of August in Atlanta. Mr. Schoppert has been in correspondence with all the Alabama secretaries, and it is more than likely that each subordinate union in the state will be represented. There will be other delegates also from No. 104.

The News chapel has recently increased its dues with a view to raising a surplus with which to do the hospitable to the other chapels of the town.

G. F. Stewart, an operator on the News, was master of ceremonies at a recent public installation of officers of the five Pythian lodges here. The occasion was a very pleasant one, with a program of music, in which President G. V. Hess, of No. 104, and Mrs. Hess participated. Foreman Lopez, of the News, was among the officers installed.

The Alabama Paper Company and Trechel Bros. have consolidated, and have a large and well-equipped job plant, union throughout.

The newspaper foremanships here continue as they have been for some years: W. S. Lopez, of the News, Will Carnes, of the Ledger, and Allen Holt, of the Age-Herald, all clever men and popular with the boys.

Charley Deaton, an ex-delegate, was recently elected chairman of the News chapel.

Will Leath, who went west for his health a year ago, is in California, and it is learned with pleasure by his friends here that he is much improved.

E. R. Calhoun.

CLARKSBURG, W. VA.

Work at present is very quiet.

At our July meeting the application of H. L. Yock was received. A committee of three was appointed to investigate and report. But before his application had been accepted Mr. Yock died. He was taken ill very suddenly July 9, and died the 10th. His remains were shipped to Weston, his former home, for burial. He leaves a wife and three children. We extend our sympathy to them in this sad hour.

J. W. Walden has given up his lease on the William McGowen job office and has accepted a position with the Wade Printing Company.

William McGowen, ex-president of No. 372, is home from New York city on a vacation. "Billy" is in fine health, and the boys are glad to see him. He is holding down a "lino" on the Wall Street Journal.

No. 372 is boosting the label some nowadays. It has issued several thousand cards bearing the label, with suitable wording. All of the boys are helping to distribute them around the city. Next in order is a four-page folder, two colors, to be gotten out soon.

If grapenuts is such a great brain developer, C. W. Post ought to take a full treatment. There's a reason.

The label is one of the most potent factors in the eight-hour fight, but we do not advertise it extensively enough. Advertise the label and ask for it.

We will land the eight-hour day here if we work hard.

Be an eight-hour fan.

We will meet at Toronto.

Oh, joy!

Walter R. Watkins.

THOUGHTS BY THE WAY.

For Mr. Post's information I will state that, in my opinion, unions, like rebellions, are not the creation of the people, but are instituted to resist the unjust treatment accorded to the workingmen. In years past, as well as at present, if the employers had treated their employes fairly there would not be any unions. The employers are the creators, indirectly, of the unions, like a corrupted government is the cause of a rebellion. So let them suffer the consequences. In many cases employers for pecuniary gain have endeavored to organize unions. I remember one case not very far from this city, in a town where there was no union, where an employer could get a big contract yearly provided he could place the label on the job, and, in order to get the work, he persuaded his men to organize a union, which they did. And now that he has lost the work, he vows unionism to Hades because they want the eight hours. This is only one instance in a thousand where employers have been benefited by the unions and did not reciprocate.

The eight-hour movement recalls to mind some incidents which tend to show why some unions are so backward in securing the eight hours or an increase in wages. I remember some years ago in an eastern city where several members agitated the question of an increase in wages, and finally one of them introduced a resolution whereby the scale of wages was to be increased from $13 to $15. But the opposition was so strong that the resolution was killed, and the strangest part of it was that, among those who voted against it, some thought the employers "would not like it;" others, who were then getting $15, thought the scale was high enough, and among the latter was one man who at that time was endeavoring to secure a situation in a neighboring city, where the scale was $20. Such unions need boosting up, and let us hope that they will get it, for their greatest good in particular and the benefit of the craft in general.

Isn't it exasperating for a top-heavy typo to be staggering home on a July Sunday morning and face a sign reading "Skates sharpened while you wait"? Or for a knight of the road, after a weary journey between two rails, to land in a mission lodging room and learn that "the way of the transgressor is hard"?

At the last regular meeting of No. 121 very little business was transacted. The label committee was instructed to "cut out" the monthly blotter, as it was hinted that returns were not great enough. Our committee from the trades council reported a rapid decrease of that body's indebtedness. It is said the first of September will see the council out of debt and in fine working order.

The state printing plant "slid" about all the printers the last week in June, and about two dozen idle men were "sessioning" for a week or ten days. The majority are again employed, however, and the bunch of idle men numbers only about twenty at present.

Tourists were numerous last month. W. H. Winters, Indianapolis; Vic Bowers, Wichita; John E. Barnes, Oklahoma City, O. T., and G. D. (Kid) Rowsell, Fort Worth, dropped in.

Sam W. McAtee, of St. Joseph, Mo., is now foreman of the Capital, and U. G. Pierce, depositing a Kansas City card, but a St. Joe product, is assistant foreman.

Now look out. All ye booze pugilists must cut it out. See the following interview reported by the associated press:

State Printer T. A. McNeal is going to run a "prohibition shop." He has announced that none of the people employed at the state printing plant will be allowed to drink liquor. "I have been asked," said Mr. McNeal, "if occasional drinking of whiskey will be a drawback to getting employment in the state printing plant. It most certainly will. No 'booze fighter' can hold a job there if I know it. Furthermore, I want no employes around the establishment who patronize a Kansas joint, whether they actually get drunk or not. So far as I am concerned, printers can make a choice between 'booze' and job, if they desire, but a man can't drink whiskey and keep a job at the same time with my consent."

I guess that will retain you for an indefinite period. E. B. MURPHY.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE EIGHT-HOUR MOVEMENT.

The eight-hour movement as such in American industry dates back to 1886. It was while the country was slowly recovering from the ravages of the crisis of '83–'84 that the agitation for the shorter workday took root, and was hailed by the working class as a solution of the unemployed problem.

Whatever may have been the prospects for success at the outset, the movement was unhappily linked with the Haymarket disaster in Chicago. This served as a damper to snuff out the enthusiasm of the agitators in a twinkling, and what goes down in history as the first general labor strike in this country ended in the fiasco of the march of Coxey's army to Washington.

It would be unprofitable to recount chronologically the train of struggles that capital and labor have engaged in on the industrial field, in order to trace through it the thread that designates the improved conditions wrenched from the employer by the employe, down to date. It would be equally unprofitable to define the part played by the printing trade in the general upheaval. Suffice it for the purposes of this paper that we recognize this upheaval. From that, we can go on to treat of the craft as we find it today, dwelling upon its distinguishing features rather than those which are characteristic of industrial activity as a whole.

The printing business is a parasite business pure and simple. It is the "business preservative of all business." Certainly it is the most parasitical of any department in the domain of manufacture, and, with the possible exception of that of professional service and personal service (to a limited degree), it is the most parasitical of any department of industrial activity.

It is due to this fact that the revolution which has been wrought in the methods of manufacture in the closing decades of the past century has not made the impression upon the printing business that it has upon the others.

This may be demonstrated in many ways. As to printing per se, it is readily seen that the effects of the linotype, improved press facilities, and labor-displacing devices in general were counteracted by the desire on the part of publishers to ascertain how much paper could be stuffed into their dailies and Sundays. Concurrent with this, extravagant ideas in the way of advertising came into vogue, which helped still more to make of our periodicals bulky stocks of sheets that no one pretends to wade through. Aside from which can also be noted as peculiar to the last few years the inordinate flooding of the market with popular novels of the day.

In a general way, every step in industrial progress, effected by the introduction of the bicycle, automobile, manufacturing machinery, and household utensils, calls for stationery, cards, folders and brochures, ad infinitum. No matter where or what the innovation may be, whether the opening of a corner store or a metalliferous mine, the promoter quickly establishes intimate relations with printers' ink. And it is not meet to deny that the printer is a party to every litigation no less so than the lawyer. And when a concern has been worsted in the struggle for existence, and the sheriff is called in to perform the last sad rites, the printer lends a hand with his good offices. When, subsequently, there spring up wildcat, get-rich schemes, the printer's talents are employed embellishing the "come-on" matter so that it will lure the public on into investing. It may be noted here also that the printer profits right substantially by the increased volume of ordinances, laws and statutes that have been and are being enacted to meet the requirements of our ever-growing, more-complicated social structure.

So it is that the great economic changes of recent years have practically left the printing trade unscathed. As a consequence, the employing printer and the employe have succeeded in coming to terms without much ado, so that the relations which obtain today still smack of the times of the guild and feudal lord.

A further phenomenon which tends to insure the old patriarchal relations is found in the fact that in no department of industry of any consequence as in that of printing are there less employes per establishment. Consequently the printing trade affords the greatest opportunity for employer and employe to meet and know each other, and thereby prevent such ruptures as are the result of misunderstanding.

The following table deduced from figures furnished by the United States census report for 1900 leads to this observation:

AVERAGES FOR SELECTED INDUSTRIES.

Classes.	Establishments.	Wage earners.	Wage earners to establishment.
Wool manufacturers	2,636	264,021	100.2
Cotton manufacturers	1,051	302,861	288.2
Iron and steel-rolling mills and steel works	438	183,023	417.8
Boots and shoes	1,600	143,922	89.3
Liquors (malt and distilled combined)	2,491	43,254	17.4
Paper and wood pulp	763	49,640	65.1
Agricultural implements	715	46,582	65.1
Slaughtering and meat packing	921	68,534	74.4
Lumber and timber products	33,035	283,260	8.6
Printing and publishing	15,305	94,604	6.2

It may not be amiss at this juncture to estimate as to just what the introduction of the eight-hour day would mean in dollars and cents.

As in the above calculations, it must be borne in mind that the figures used are for 1900, can not, of course, take into consideration the changes of the past five years, that they comprise both ends of the business, printing and publishing, and are therefore to be accepted for what they are worth.

According to the 1900 census report, the capital employed in printing and publishing was $192,443,708. The value of the products is given at $222,983,569, netting a profit of $30,539,861, or 15.8 per cent. The wages paid were $50,333,051.

For the purposes of this inquiry, let us accept the claim of the typothetæ that the eight-hour day would be an equivalent not only of 12½ per cent increase in wages, but would mean an added cost of 20 per cent. It must be admitted that to secure the same output in a shorter workday would necessitate an additional force of men and possibly additional material. Another item of expense might be incurred in the shape of interest either on such money as the employer must borrow to pay the extra wages or that he forfeits by withdrawing his funds from an interest-paying institution. And further, let us take it for granted that the typothetæ will make no effort to shift the burden, if not all of the added cost, to the shoulder of the consumer.

Twenty per cent increase in wages means a sum of $10,066,610 and raises the total invested capital to $202,510,318.

On this basis, the profit under the new conditions would be $20,473,251, or 10.1 per cent.

While this may appear to be a substantial "falling off," it must likewise appear that 10.1 per cent is an increment not to be sneered at or despised.

The real significance of the eight-hour movement is hardly to be found in the monetary considerations involved, but rather in the disturbances it portends for the future.

To conclude, then, the world is not going to cease turning if the fight for the shorter workday is lost, nor is the world going to turn with accelerated speed if the fight is won. The eight-hour movement is but a manifestation of the antagonism of interests of employer and employe. If it need be given unwarranted importance, when it is but a link in the chain, then let it be as the harbinger of the many similar concessions the workers will demand and secure before they are satisfied that they have attained the pinnacle of material comfort and happiness.

PEORIA, ILL.

President Palmer, of No. 29, is looking fine as lieutenant of police under the new administration. The boys of No. 29 presented him with a gold star.

The state meet here was a hummer—but nothing in comparison with what next year's will be.

Eight hours looks good to us. There is every reason for our members to feel encouraged.

The Illinois Allied Printing Crafts Union of Illinois held its thirteenth annual session in this city, June 23 to 25. There were about forty cities represented, and the session is said to have been one of the most profitable to the allied trades ever held. The class of delegates sent here shows that the unions realize that the time is ripe for earnest deliberation, and not only high platitudes, but actual work for the betterment of the trades. It is believed that the plans outlined by the convention will produce that result. Another good thing the convention did was to decide to meet in Peoria one year hence.

The session was called to order by President Palmer, of the local union, on Wednesday morning, and Secretary Bush, on behalf of the local printing crafts, gave them a warm welcome. President Clarke made a suitable reply.

On Wednesday afternoon there was much business transacted of a routine nature, and then the delegates were shown around the city by the entertainment committee, with Commodore C. W. Parry as chairman of the same.

On Thursday morning the meeting convened at the usual hour, and Jesse Sawyer took a snap shot at the bunch on the courthouse steps, and got a good picture.

The election of officers resulted as follows:

President, W. D. Clarke, Chicago; vice-president, Walter S. Bush, Peoria; secretary-treasurer, John A. Onyun, Peoria; sergeant-at-arms, William Hulschuch, Peoria; delegates to the state federation of labor, L. L. Underwood, Decatur; W. F. Stoltz, Champaign, and Samuel Olson, Chicago.

The convention condemned the open shop proposition.

W. B. Conkey, who runs a "rat" shop at Hammond, Ind., was also given a drubbing.

Ringing resolutions were adopted on the eight-hour day which is to take effect on January 1 next.

President Clarke is thoroughly satisfied with the progress of the past year, and that the state organization as a body has established itself as an organization of value to the crafts of the state, and that the next meeting will be a large affair.

Michael Colbert, the organizer for the International Union, considers the Peoria convention one of the most successful gatherings it has been his lot to attend, and says it will be of great benefit to the unions of the state. Results that are now being obtained will increase its usefulness and the attendance. An active interest by all unions of the state is all that is necessary to make the organization a great power for good. WALTER S. BUSH.

AN EIGHT-HOUR WORKING DAY.

The general progress of the world has been slow though it has been sure.

If we succeed in establishing the eight-hour day on January 1, 1906, it will not mean that we secured this great blessing during the past few months or even the past few years. The eight-hour movement represents many, many years of organized effort and agitation.

All kinds, or, perhaps, I should say many kinds of arguments have been made in favor of the eight-hour day. It will generally be conceded that the man who loves work under decent conditions has in him just so much labor force.

If he works twelve hours a day he will be an old man at fifty. If he works ten hours per day he may be a very old man at sixty, and if he works eight hours per day he may be able to perform a fair day's work at sixty-five or even seventy. In other words, the longer the day's labor the shorter the lifetime of work.

I am one who believes that work is the salvation of the race, but by this I do not mean overwork.

If the above argument is logical it clearly follows that the nation at large, that is society, gets in the long run just as much useful labor from the eight-hour system as from the ten or twelve or fourteen hours a day system.

The economic loss then amounts really to nothing, and would amount to nothing so far as the nation is concerned, by the establishment of an eight-hour workday in all those establishments in which there is little or no competition with foreign nations. Contractors do not build houses in Germany and import them into Indianapolis, nor do the job printers in France contract to do job printing in St. Louis.

With the advantage of an eight-hour day for many trades and the growing sentiment by all classes there will come, in time, some sort of an international agreement.

If the printers are successful it drives one more nail in the doomed ten-hour coffin.

That our power is greatest upon the economic field no clear thinking student will deny.

It is in the trade union movement and that alone that the working class can attain anything like solidarity.

We can never succeed in effecting anywhere near a solid union in religion or politics. Moreover, if we can not organize the printers on the lines of least resistance, the typographical union, we can not organize them at all.

Therefore it is the union movement and that alone that is worth our effort, time and money.

There are no pipe dreams about the trades union movement. It is the simple, logical, honest way, and the successful way to peace and progress.

Lawrence, Mass. R. S. MALONEY.

THE MISSING PRONOUN.

The language is supposed to lack a singular personal pronoun common gender. It is suggested that the French "en" might be imported, but when we consider the difficulty in establishing the neuter "its" in place of "his" at the time when our tongue was perhaps more flexible than now, we may be sure that we couldn't smuggle that little foreigner in by any device if we wanted to. On the other hand, it has been contended that "one" and "one's" serve every purpose, but any one who has had much "cobbling" to do knows that they do not. The employment of "his" in this connection seems now to be well sanctioned, however. Dr. Lyman Abbott says that "no man, woman or child ever read Roe's works * * * but that he was the better for it." (Roe is quite harmless, we know, but that's not the point, of course.) A recent article says: "Each member of the Associated Press is entitled to receive his despatches," etc., "his" evidently doing duty for proprietor, corporation, paper or what you will. Much virtue in a "his," and it's a convenient way out of a difficulty.

No. 146 still moves along in the right road. At our meetings we have a goodly attendance and the most harmonious sessions in the history of our organization. Our president, F. W. Snider, believes in getting through the meetings without any long-winded speeches, and his ideas on that score are meeting with success, as we seldom have a request for leave to retire unless the member has very important business on hand.

One of our members, R. E. Hardwicke, is the newly-elected president of the trades assembly.

V. E. Hindman has severed his connection with the News as foreman.

It is expected that several members from here will attend the convention.

It is the general idea here that the celebration of Labor day this year should take the form of a large picnic or an excursion. Preparations for a proper celebration of the day are now in the hands of the trades assembly.

WILMINGTON, DEL.

Robert Emmet Griffith, who for about nineteen years was a member of No. 123, died at the home of his brother-in-law, Paul J. Bogan, at Henry Clay, Del., on July 4, 1905, aged 39 years. He was a stanch union man, and always a good friend to the traveler.

A number of our employing printers attended the Philadelphia meeting of employers, but did not act in the same manner as their brethren from the city of brotherly love. We have seen no signs which lead us to suspect such action. The delegate for the district of Delaware, George A. Wolf, has always treated No. 123 with consideration, and is at the present using the label of the typographical union. We are inclined to think that when the question, from our standpoint, is presented to him, he will act with consideration for our well-being and advancement.

We regret to announce the illness of our secretary-treasurer, Albert O. H. Grier. Mr. Grier has been confined to his bed with typhoid fever for about four weeks, but at present writing is on the road to recovery.

Out of respect for our late member, Mr. Griffith, no business was transacted at our last meeting, except such as was of a memorial character. The union donated a floral offering of a large wreath, in the centre of which was a floral stick with the inscription "W. T. U. 123." Arrangements were also made to view the body of our late member on Thursday evening, and about a score of our faithful were in attendance.

Business in our city is fair, and some offices are enjoying plenty of work.

We are indeed pleased to hear of No. 2's determination to "sit tight" on the eight-hour question. D. H. RUSSELL.

A SINISTER PROGRAM.

One of the most insistent demands of the Citizens' Industrial Alliance is the "open shop." If this demand is fully comprehended it anticipates the absolute annihilation of trade unions. It also means the extinction of the small business man. There are many who will object to this conclusion, and therefore it will be necessary to present facts to support it. I am convinced that it is essential that all true and sincere union men possess a knowledge of the facts and the argument of which they form the basis, so that they may be able to expose the sinister object of those who insistently and persistently advocate the "open shop."

The manufacturers' association is the national, the citizens' alliance the local, organization of the employing class. Small business and professional men are invited to become members. We all know the lawless acts committed by members of the citizens' alliance in Colorado, and because of that knowledge we are able to judge the character of the organization and also the objects it proposes to realize.

Their cardinal principles are: "Enforcement of the law; preservation of constitutional rights; open shop; industrial peace; no restriction of output; no limitation of apprentices," etc.

How will the inauguration of the "open shop" affect the trade union?

The "open shop" will give the employer the right to employ whom he may choose; to dictate the wages, hours and conditions of employment. It will give him the power to put women and children in the places of men. It will enable him to operate his factory long hours, and he will be able to successfully refuse to pay for overtime. It will enable him to set the price he will pay for labor at the cost of keeping the workers in condition to work. Those who can afford to work cheapest will be the ones employed. A furious competition among those seeking employment will ensue, and the workers of the United States will sink gradually but surely to the level of the Chinese, if the ideals of the citizens' alliance are realized.

At first attempts will be made to keep up the organization of the union. Union men will pay dues into the union; officers will administer as many of the union laws as possible. But as soon as dull times come and some one is laid off, it will be a union man. The non-union man will be retained. The union officers will be blacklisted. No one will be found to take their places. Wages will fall and the hours will be lengthened.

When wages are high the business man gets his share of the prosperity. When wages are cut the business man's trade suffers and his profits dwindle. He is not doing very well now, because of the trusts. His chances for doing better in the future are not very bright. He can not afford to ally himself with the citizens' alliance, because it means a restricted business and less profit. For the majority it would mean annihilation in the near future. Recently there has been a disposition on the part of a great many business men to discourage the buying of union-made goods. Union-labeled goods are kept out of sight, and non-union goods substituted. No union man should allow such actions to go unchallenged. He should in all instances demand and insist upon having only union-made goods. This will do more toward forcing organization than any other method which has been tried. If the union men and women will but act consistently the "scab" products of underpaid wage slaves would soon be a drug on the market, and, finally, would disappear almost entirely.

It remains for each of us to do our duty. Let no one default. The present situation demands prompt action. Let us show the world that we are real union men, not merely in name. And this will greatly assist in getting shorter hours.

OMAHA, NEB.

Omaha printers would like to see Colorado Springs named as the next convention city.

Omaha sends greeting to the convention and hopes for a harmonious session, with a solid front for the eight-hour day.

No. 190 has been given charge of the Labor day celebration in Omaha this year. The eight-hour question will have a prominent place on the program.

The local situation as regards the eight-hour movement is quiet at this writing. Employers seem to have their eyes turned toward some other cities just now.

I notice in the columns of THE JOURNAL that Charles Copenharve, an honorary member of No. 190, has been elected delegate from the Butte (Mont.) Newspaper Writers' Union.

The Labor Gazette is a new publication gotten out in South Omaha. The late packing-house strike caused a decrease in the membership of unions in that city, and it will be the aim of the Gazette to give encouragement and aid in the reorganization of unions. I. J. COPENHARVE.

ANENT THE COUNTRY PRINTER.

In order for us to be successful in our efforts for the eight-hour day, in the opinion of the undersigned, the International body must make an effort to do something with the country printer. Some plan should be formulated to educate him—to teach him, at least, the rudiments and benefits to be derived from being a member of our organization.

As a general thing, the country printer comes to a large city, or even a large-sized country town, from a remote village, where he has been receiving a stipend ranging from $6 a week to possibly $8 or even $10, ignorant of unionism and all the blessings that flow from it. He strolls into several offices until he eventually strikes one that will employ him. The foreman sizes him up readily, of course, for what he is, and immediately commences a dicker with him. He offers him, say, $12 a week, and the young fellow thinks he has struck a good thing. He accepts the situation—ignorantly, of course, in nine cases out of ten—because, he argues, am I not getting $2, $4 or $6 more than I got at home? He don't look around any further or ask many questions; he knows, he thinks, when he has got a good thing, and goes on in blissful ignorance until, finally, he happens upon some one who disabuses his mind and tells him of the benign benefits and helpfulness of unionism, aside from a financial standpoint. They stay in these non-union offices until they become contaminated; they hear nothing of our glorious union except to its detriment.

Many may consider this an overdrawn tale, but the writer of this article, in his forty-odd years' experience in the printing business, and up to the last twenty years serving the union of which he is at present a member (No. 8), and larger and smaller unions in other places, in the capacity of officer and member of all the committees, from the executive down, has had this same thing come under his personal observation at least half a dozen times.

I saw in THE JOURNAL recently an article on this subject which I think has some merit in it. It purposed to consolidate the towns of one, two and three hundred inhabitants into a union, elect its officers and apply to the International for a charter.

Outside of the country printer (of course, including him, too), I think it would be money well spent for the International to hire one of its members to go throughout its jurisdiction explaining the methods, usages and benefits to be derived from being a member of our organization.

A PREAMBLE PROPOSED.

The fifty-first session of the International Typographical Union, which is to meet at Toronto on the 14th of August, will have submitted to it a proposition which is to serve as a preamble to the constitution. It may be said that for fifty years this body has fared well, but since we are to inaugurate within five months a quite radical change it may not be amiss to place before our members and those who may hereafter ally themselves to our great cause a distinct declaration that will not permit of any doubt, and place ourselves in line with the workers of the universe who seek to emancipate the working class.

The spirit of this declaration will appeal to all who are conscious of the great task before us, and should the referendum be given an opportunity to express itself I believe it will be approved by a handsome vote.

The proposition is as follows:

DECLARATORY.

The International Typographical Union being distinctly a class organization, embracing workers following kindred crafts in the printing industry, which seeks to improve the economic and social condition of its members, emphasizes the necessity of concerted action upon the industrial as well as political field. To accomplish the purpose for which it has been called into existence, its members must keep in mind that private ownership of the tools and machinery required in their calling is inimical to the interest of the organization, as the antagonism of the employers ever manifests when demands for better conditions, higher wages, or less hours of labor per day are presented, and the aim and object of the International Typographical Union therefore is, in common with all industrial combinations of the working class, to wrest from the exploiting class the power to oppress. We, therefore, declare it consistent with the ethics of unionism and the sacred duty of every honorable member of this union to sever his or her affiliation with all political parties upholding capitalism, whose representitives are using the powers of government to encroach upon the liberties of the working class, thus annulling all the advantages that are momentarily gained upon the industrial field by organized labor, and thwarting all the efforts for the emancipation of the wealth producers.

Typographia No. 6, at its meeting July 10, 1905, without a dissenting voice endorsed this declaration, and whether the convention approves or not, members of affiliated unions should study the matter and permit of the fullest and freest discussion of the same.

Our late experience in St. Louis, the attitude of the Chicago and Philadelphia typothetæs, and the hostility of employers generally ought to make clear to our members where we are at. The lines of the class war are clearly demarked; the owners of the tools and machinery with which our people work are adverse to making any concessions unless forced to do so. The army of unemployed craftsmen is constantly growing, and necessity forces us to adopt some measures whereby opportunities can be created allowing them to apply their talents in the vocations they follow. The private ownership of the machinery of production and means of distribution stands between the man and the job.

This obstacle must be removed, not only in our calling but wherever wealth production is engaged in. We can not expect that our unfortunate fellow workers will forever respect the claims of those who are employed and "keep on the move" to find a job. There are not jobs enough to go around under a capitalistic regime, consequently, we that work must share with our brothers the opportunities or create new ones. I see no other way than to socialize the machinery of wealth production and the means through which they find distribution. We must abolish, if we wish to be true to our pledge, a state of society which is inimical to the best interest of the human family, and the purpose and intent of this desire must be constantly in our mind and before our eyes.

To accomplish this is the object of this declaration, and I hope our representitives at Toronto will approve of the same and allow the membership to determine whether the time is now come that it shall be our tocsin. ROBERT BANDLOW.

Cleveland, Ohio.

DETROIT, MICH.

Attention of delegates and visitors to Toronto is called to the fact that No. 18 is directly in the path of the Western and Southern visitors, and if your itinerary does not include a stopover at Detroit the trip will be far from a success—as delegates to this city in 1899 will testify.

Arrangements have been made and committees appointed to entertain all visitors who stop off at Detroit. At the last meeting of No. 18 the officers of the club tendered the Printers' Club as the headquarters for the union and the visitors, and the offer was accepted, the rooms being at once placed in the hands of the board of directors for decoration. The entertainment committee has an elaborate program ready for the Saturday preceding the convention. Headquarters (the club) are at 6-8 Barclay Place, in the heart of the city, convenient to all hotels and restaurants, and will be open continuously from Friday morning to Sunday, with the reception committee in attendance. As we have entertained 500 in one evening we have no fear of being overcrowded.

The last election resulted in the selection of Gilbert Dickson as president by an overwhelming majority. He is an operator on the Tribune and popular alike with the jobbers and news men.

In the run for delegate a most unusual result is recorded in the fact that both our representitives were selected from one office—the Free Press—and both operators, John McLogan representing the night side, and Frank (Chester) Porter the day side, "Mac" receiving the compliment of carrying the credentials with the largest vote ever given a delegate from No. 18.

At the recent annual election of club officers. Vice-President Lloyd was elected to succeed Mina Garrels. "Bill" Bessler was unanimously selected to succeed himself as treasurer. The new board of directors is represented by such popular and well-known members as "King" Kessel, "Bill" Barber, "Hee-Haw" Bastien, "Chief" Forney, "Parson" Rinshed, Morris Gloster and Joe ("Pop") Higgins.

As usual in midsummer, work is not as brisk as at other seasons, but as this is such a beautiful water resort many of the boys are taking vacations at this time, and so leave plenty of work for those looking for it, and no complaints are heard.

There is a suppressed feeling of excitement abroad as to what the outcome will be when a demand for the eight hours is made, but all is quiet on the surface.

At the convention Detroit will cut some figure in the "open shop" question, as we have a couple of interesting cases on hand. WALTER O'DAY.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.

Seven new members were initiated at the July meeting of No. 15, and other applications are in the hands of the membership committee. The readiness with which the job printers of Rochester respond to the call of the eight-hour campaign shows how much the nine-hour day has done to convince them of the value of shorter hours. Present conditions in newsrooms, which were made possible largely by the eight-hour workday, also have had an educational effect. For upward of twenty-five years, and until nine hours became the limit in jobrooms through the efforts of the International, the jobber who received more than the $14 scale in this city was a curiosity; and where the union was powerless to enforce this scale wages were much lower. The nine-hour day changed the situation, until today the wages of jobmen show a tendency upward. It is being quite generally accepted nowadays by workmen of all trades that shorter hours confer greater protection and benefit than anything trade unions can secure.

The ex-delegates' association has about completed its plans for entertaining visiting delegates. The program includes a ride about the city during the early part of Saturday afternoon, followed by an "eight-hour" banquet at Colonial hall, in which the entire membership of No. 15 are invited to participate. After the banquet chartered cars will carry the party to Ontario Beach, where numerous attractions will be enjoyed until time of departure of the boat for Toronto. Visitors who desire to spend Sunday in Rochester may return by trolley, and ample entertainment will be furnished to make their stay a pleasant one.

The Union and Advertiser has been removed from the unfair list of No. 15.

The Times, of this city, has been growing steadily during the past five years, and promises some day to be in the front rank of the local dailies. Another large room has been added to its present quarters, the ad alley occupying the new space. This chapel has furnished good timber in the past for No. 15's official staff, and the chances are excellent for a continuance of the friendly attitude of its management toward our organization.

A deliberate attempt is being made by the chamber of commerce to glut the labor market of this city, so as to furnish cheap labor to the large concerns which it has induced to locate here. Ads have been placed in different cities and towns asking working people "to come to Rochester and get a job." As a result, hundreds come on, only to find that they have been victimized. In several instances the Salvation Army and other charitable societies have had to lend assistance. The pressure became so strong upon it that the secretary of the chamber was forced to announce that "we won't be able to get work for many more men; but it will be possible to place seven or eight hundred women between seventeen and twenty-five years of age at work in Rochester factories immediately." These girls are wanted for the Cluett collar factory, which decided to remove to this city after locking out its employes in Troy because they would not submit to a reduction of wages. The central trades council has placed a boycott upon this factory, has organized a laundry workers' union, and sent notices throughout the country that the "Help" ad is a fake. Labor today does not seem to even enjoy the same legal standing as other commodities do—for sometimes it is a crime to obtain money or property under false pretenses, but labor may be secured nowadays in any old way without fear of legal interference.

The exceeding hot weather on the July meeting day of No. 15 did not interfere with action upon several important matters. The invitation of Syracuse Union to participate in an eight-hour conference in that city was heartily accepted, and Bert H. Bates elected to represent us there. A resolution was also adopted expressing satisfaction with the results attained by the International Eight-Hour Committee, and our delegates to the convention were instructed to do everything within their power to uphold and strengthen the eight-hour movement. Another resolution was adopted commending President Lynch and the executive council for their prompt and righteous action in the St. Louis affair. The question of observing Labor day was brought up and thoroughly discussed. The committee on arrangements consists of John J. Skelly, L. J. Hyde, John McNally, Lynn Shumway and Thomas Rowland. It is expected that Labor day this year will be turned into an enthusiastic demonstration for the printers' eight-hour day.

The results which inevitably follow a temporary defeat of organized labor have overtaken the clothing trade of this city. The recent failure of the clothing cutters to secure the shorter workday has brought a return of the sweatshop system in its most repulsive form. A committee of the central trades council on a quiet tour of inspection found cases where large families were eating, sleeping and finishing clothing in one small room.

One place discovered in a Front street block was pronounced by the factory inspector to be second only in vileness to one found in New York city. While it has been possible for the central trades to compel the authorities to act against such an extreme case as that cited above, the effect of the law does not reach the manufacturers, but falls heavily upon the poor, ignorant sweatshop workers. Even though the authorities were inclined to strictly enforce the existing factory law, it would be found impotent to stamp out the system. There are "kinks" in it, placed there by "smart" lawyers, whom the working people permit to make and break legislation that they ought to look after themselves. HENRY D. HENDERSON.

BATAVIA, N. Y.

Batavia's new journalistic venture, the Labor Leader, published in the interests of the organized craft, is meeting with popular favor. Merton L. Dennis, the editor, is a conscientious and painstaking young man who is making economic problems a thorough study. For nearly three years he resided in New York city, with the sole object of perfecting himself in journalism in its most active phases, and has long been a student of the principles of trade unionism. The paper, which is issued from the Fix Printery, sparkles with good things, and its columns show clean, clear-cut literature. The local unions have subscribed liberally and the advertising patronage appears well handled. Mr. Dennis has been selected by the central labor union as an organizer, and there is a reasonable certainty that new charters will be decorating Federal hall before many moons.

Of course, the Toronto convention is the main topic of conversation throughout printerdom, and Batavia stands in pretty close to the hub. William R. Lucas, of the Times composing room, has been elected as delegate, with Edward Fix as alternate. Batavia now enjoys an eight-and-one-half-hour day and has the eight-hour day contracted for. No. 511 is boosting the movement along to the limit of its ability for all the other unions to make good.

There is much doing in label advertising in Batavia. In addition to what the locals are taking care of in nice shape, the central labor union has a novel plan before it to make a display at the Genesee county fair in September, the management inviting such an exhibit, and it is anticipated that the idea will be carried out to great advantage. Typographical union should boost, boost, boost.

And Labor day comes next—the one big day of all the year in Batavia, for it is past memory since the Fourth has been celebrated. The central labor union and the carpenters' union have united on a program which promises to outshine even Old Sol. Last year Congressman Sulzer, of New York, was the orator of the day, and no union need look for a better man than this same William. John V. White, of Chicago, and Donald Hall, of New York, are under consideration by the committee for speakers this year. The plan adopted last year of having a Labor day sermon will be continued.

Batavia readers of Buffalo's labor paper, Progress, are pleased to note the prosperity it is enjoying. Recently enlarged to eight pages, Progress announces that it soon will be issued semi-weekly, looking forward to becoming a daily.

William S. Waudby, of Batavia, recently celebrated a birthday anniversary, and received many pleasant reminders of the occasion. Mr. Waudby for quite a while has been stationed in Buffalo, compiling statistics, and accordingly is enjoying more than usual opportunities to be with his family, his position frequently keeping him away months at a time. Mrs. Waudby possesses appreciative theatrical talent, and in May took a leading part in a play put on at the Opera House by the central labor union, and her interpretation was superb, calling forth flattering tributes from the daily press. Miss Cecil Waudby is winning a place in musical circles as a violinist.

Work in Batavia does not vary to any great extent the year round. There is seldom any great demand for additional men, the settled policy of the offices being to retain regulars and to keep all hands on deck, even in the calmest days.

WILLIAM H. RIAL.

WASHINGTON, PA.

No. 456's delegate to Toronto, Canada, in the person of Robert C. ("Mose") McCracken, gives to the International convention a parliamentarian of the first "water." (Accent on the water, please.) "Bob," or "Mose," as he is known by all of us, comes from a little town near here that used to be nothing but a milk station and a stop for country produce on the B. & O. Railroad. He learned the business by pulling a "strong-arm" (Washington hand press) for 600 copies weekly. This added to his physical makeup. Then he used to "smudge" with reglets cut to picas made from cigar boxes and attend spellin' bees at the different township schoolhouses—this makes up the mental ability. He will be found not wanting. I thus leave "Bob" in the hands of friends.

One new member was initiated at our last meeting—Arthur Griffith, who has the making of one who "wishes to excel in the work of his craft."

Fred Christman, a popular operator on one of the Observer machines, laid off recently on account of wrenching one of his legs. Now, how a linotype operator can wrench a leg on a machine is more than we know.

At the last meeting a motion was carried to the effect that the entire membership be supplied with Labor day tickets, to be purchased out of the funds of the union.

If satisfactory arrangements can be made between the Central Trades Assembly and the Pittsburg Dispatch composing room baseball team, the Washington printers and the Dispatch boys may play an afternoon game at Trinity Hall park on Labor day.

Every union printer should read and digest Joseph P. Keating's Toledo letters which appear in THE JOURNAL. "There's a man after my own heart." His article on "Job Printers" in the June number is worthy of praise.

THE EIGHT-HOUR DAY.

May 1, 1886, was the date fixed by the labor organizations of the United States for making a general united effort to inaugurate the eight-hour workday, but that was as far as the movement extended. Nearly twenty years have gone by, and—

To those who advocate more than eight hours for a day's work, as well as demand a greater amount of output or production for a day's labor, I want to ask the question: "What good could it do if every workingman in existence were to work double the hours hereafter, or put twice as much energy into his task?" Would it not become harder for the unemployed to find work, and would it not soon be found necessary to lay off one-half of the workers in order to curtail the overproduction caused by this extra work?

Men of our time are really working too much. Our workers, with modern inventions, do not have a proper proportion of recreation interspersed with their labor (unless it be involuntary idleness, with no "wages"). The share of productive energy is too small. The increased tensity of work only results in increased profit to those who are working the workers.

It is the helpless position of labor in general which causes long hours of toil in return for meager pay. When labor enjoys the blessings of a "square deal" and ceases to be at the mercy of the whims of capital, no branch of labor will fail to be benefited by the reduction in the hours of labor to eight for a normal workday. But the workingman will have to be his own emancipator; he will have to work out his own salvation; he will never have the co-operation of the capitalists. The civic federation may help us in America, but at this writing it is a doubtful proposition.

It is idle to expect the aid of our lawmakers; this means for obtaining the required legislation the people hold in their own hands, and they must elect their own men to legislative positions, which would enable them to carry out ideas recognized as necessary for the well-being of the community, irrespective of their consequences upon powerful individual or speculative interests.

We advocate fewer hours of labor as American citizens who have duties to perform to ourselves, our families and our country. No man who works ten, twelve or fourteen hours a day can do his proper duties in this world. The body must have rest; the mind must be recreated; our wives and children must have that attention which is due them if we would have the former happy and make the latter good citizens; but it is the commonwealth that suffers most, perhaps, from long and excessive hours of labor, for no man can vote intelligently unless he reads and thinks, and no one can do that whose bodily strength and vitality is worn out by hard labor. To this excessive toil may be attributed our rotten and corrupt politics.

Fewer hours of labor will mean less enforced idleness, more money in circulation, and better times for all—wage-workers, salaried men, merchants and manufacturers.

A general uniform restriction of the working time must be consummated. The International Typographical Union of North America will, upon January 1, 1906, inaugurate the eight hour workday for their handicraftsmen.

Its success is assured.

What are the other trade unions doing? Very little of a concentrated form.

The American Federation of Labor "advocates" the eight-hour day, but it is doing but little work of a general nature to put it into effective operation amongst the numerous crafts represented within that formidable body. The federation will support the typographical union in enforcing its demands, however.

The eight-hour day will not bring about universal plenty and content, but it will equalize the hard conditions of the contest for a living to a large extent. It will reduce the friction between labor and capital. It will remove a great incentive to strikes. The "public" has profited by the introduction of machinery and machine-made products, and it is high time that the wageworker (the producer of wealth) should profit by a reduction of his hours of labor.

The evils of an excessive workday were first exposed in England during the early part of the nineteenth century, after several investigations by Parliament, but the American lawmakers were slow to follow the example. It was not until 1825 that strikes were begun for a ten-hour law, the building trades and shipyards workmen being the aggressors. In 1835 the ten-hour law was established in Baltimore, and a presidential order in 1840 made it a rule in the government navy yards. In 1851 the masons and carpenters won their fight for the ten-hour day in many cities throughout the country.

Pennsylvania was the first to enact the ten-hour day for women and children in factories of the commonwealth. Massachusetts was the next state to follow, in 1874—but as late as 1881 the other New England states and New York state still maintained the eleven-hour law for factories. At the present time nearly all the states limit the hours for labor of women and children to ten, or a maximum of sixty hours per week. In Massachusetts the maximum is fifty-eight; in Wisconsin forty-eight, and in New Jersey and Ohio it is fifty-four.

In some occupations, such as the railroads, bakeries, paper mills, etc., the ten-hour law has not been put in force, and although the government may not interfere with the "freedom of contract" act, it can protect workmen in occupations where excessive hours of labor impair the health of the workmen.

The agitation for an eight-hour day began in this country soon after its inauguration in Australia in 1856. In 1867 Connecticut made it a legal day's work in the absence of "any agreement to the contrary," and during the same year congress established the eight-hour day for its mechanics and per diem employes. In 1886 there were 256 strikes in New York state for the reduction of hours. Many were successful in securing either the eight or the nine-hour day, and the cigarmakers' unions won their eight-hour day without a strike. In 1890 the Brotherhood of Carpenters, backed by the American Federation of Labor, won their demand for an eight-hour day in New York city and in thirty-five other cities throughout the United States; the brotherhood also obtained the nine-hour day in 240 other cities and towns.

The civic federation is well aware of the fact that the eight-hour measure is the principal demand of organized labor upon the employers, and with this question definitely settled for a term of years many strikes would be eliminated from the calendar. In fact, it is my candid opinion that the eight-hour workday is a cure for strikes. At least I will cheerfully recommend it as such to all fair-minded employers and advise them to give it a fair trial.

Further, let labor be rewarded by this eight-hour workday, and a healthy social improvement will be found in every community. Better homes, better wives and husbands, happier children, would be the immediate result from our eight-hour workday. What could be more to boast of than these conditions from a nation that publishes its prosperity to the world? Let us all strive with our utmost strength to bring this to a happy climax.

Success to the International Typographical Union of North America in their God-given movement for man's amelioration, is my fraternal greeting.

Batavia, N. Y. WILLIAM S. WAUDBY.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

Work is dull.

No. 252 will be represented at Toronto.

To be successful January 1, '06, much work must be done, and it is up to every member to be active.

Robert Cherry, ex-president, has been appointed chairman of the eight-hour committee.

The different societies in the city were asked by the label committee to have the label on their printing. The committee received many returns from a neat circular and several said the label would appear on all occasions.

Vice-President E. C. Olds, having left for Rochester, N. Y., the office was declared vacant, and recently Edward Bennetto was elected to fill the vacancy. Mr. Olds is a proofreader on the Rochester Herald. He says the "Flower City" is a good town for printers.

There are seven concerns in this city that do a large amount of their own printing. The list, with the number of hours per day, is as follows: Warner Brothers, ten; Graphophone, nine; Cartridge Company, ten; Bridgeport Box Company, nine; Birdseye-Somers Corset Company, ten; Taylor's Corset and Box Factory, ten; Batcheller & Co., corsets, ten. Two union men are employed at the Graphophone Company and two at Warner Brothers.

Bids were advertised for the printing of the Municipal Year Book by the printing committee of the aldermen in June, and recently the contract was awarded to the Advocate Printing Company. It will bear the label. It has been sublet to Joyce & Sherwood.

John Warmingham, better known as "Teddy," has a neat little card, in three colors, for use at Toronto. If your correspondent is not able to represent No. 252, August 14, "Teddy" will be there at roll call. He was a delegate to St. Louis. Delegate Bennetto joined No. 91 in 1881, and was a resident of Toronto for sixteen months. If he is not able to be present it will be one of the few times that things have not gone "Eddie's" way.

All business of importance transacted at the central labor union is well looked after by the committee from No. 252. It is composed of Messrs. Brennan, Lynders and Houston.

I have had the misfortune to set up two "ads" from the pen of a certain manufacturer of "coffee," etc., recently, and I should judge by the copy (and I followed it) that they were written by an amateur. This class of advertising only helps our cause. EDWARD BENNETTO.

HOLYOKE, MASS.

There is much enthusiasm here for the eight-hour day. The eight-hour buttons meet with general favor and are worn by nearly all the members.

The list sent out by the International Typographical Union through the eight-hour committee shows that each month there are unions receiving, or making arrangements to receive, the eight-hour day by January 1, 1905. If the list continues to grow as at present, the efforts of the typothetæ to stave off the inauguration of the shorter workday will be futile. The eight-hour day must come, and is recognized to be the logical workday by a great and increasing number of employers throughout the country.

At our last meeting the following were elected as delegates to the central labor union for the ensuing six months: Frank H. Wade, George B. Noonan, J. B. Edwards, William Daily, E. S. Alden.

Trade is not very brisk, and there are enough printers in town to do the work.

We had hopes that this union might be represented at Toronto. The finances of the local, at this time, will not stand the pressure.

E. S. ALDEN.

WINNIPEG, CANADA.

Another lie has been nailed to the counter! The typothetæ, in their herculean but fruitless efforts to swing the pendulum of public opinion in their favor, circulated the outrageous and entirely uncalled-for statement that No. 191 had practically completed negotiations for a continuance of the book and job scale and the nine-hour day under the conditions as at present constituted, but through the energy of our International president, backed up by a timely rejoinder by President McKim, this amazing and deliberate falsehood has been refuted, and Secretary Macintyre and his associates will now have to look elsewhere for arguments in support of their forlorn and hopeless cause. I have no hesitation in saying that none of the affiliated unions are more enthusiastic in their support of the policy propounded by the International body than the two hundred and more members who have pledged their allegiance to No. 191, and the wish on the part of the typothetæ that our local organization would lay down the cudgels and decline to take part in the onward and progressive and aggressive movement must certainly have been father to the thought. If one may judge from the number of eight-hour buttons which are being worn wherever printers most do congregate, and from the opinions and convictions which are being freely expressed on every side, the outcome of the issue next January will certainly rank in Winnipeg as one of the most glorious victories which has been achieved by organized labor, not only in this, but in any other part of the continent.

For a long, long time the various trade unions in Winnipeg, and the typographical union in particular, have been placed at a serious disadvantage owing to the absence of adequate accommodation for the great and growing needs of their increasing membership, and because of the difficulty in obtaining sufficiently commodious headquarters for their periodical meetings. This obstacle, however, is being rapidly overcome. A trades hall company has been incorporated for the purpose of providing permanent headquarters for organized labor, the capital stock of the company being $50,000, divided into shares of $25 each. The block on James street formerly owned by the Hoover Manufacturing Company has been purchased, and is being rebuilt and refitted, and when completed will have cost somewhere in the neighborhood of $56,000. Two flats of the building will be devoted to hall accommodations, and as this is at present at a premium in Winnipeg, the fact will be doubly welcome. The idea is being taken up enthusiastically by the trade unions of the city, and at its last meeting No. 191 determined not to lag behind in the onward movement, decided to take up twenty shares in the building at a cost of $500, and thus not only assist the promoters to realize their ambitions, but also to secure headquarters which will be worthy of an organization with such glorious traditions and such splendid prospects for future development.

Our delegates to the Toronto convention are Joe Jerrard and Charlie Hawley, who secured top places after a stiff fight, and who may be depended upon to fill the positions worthily and well. The delicate aroma and fragrance of the cigars has not vanished even yet, notwithstanding the suggestion that they were ordered by one optimistic candidate before the result was announced.

Joe Clinton, an ex-secretary of No. 91, who rendered valuable assistance to the election committee, has been presented with an elegant briar as a memento of the occasion.

Charlie Hawley, one of the delegates-elect, left here on July 1 for the east, where he expects to undergo an operation for a rheumatic knee before pouring forth his floods of eloquence at the convention.

Delegates who pass through Winnipeg on their way east should arrange for a stop-over. The members of No. 191 will be delighted to show them the glories and beauties (who whistled, please?) of the Prairie City.

Talking of the convention reminds me that a strong effort is to be made at the next International election to nominate a vice-president from this side of the border.

The sympathy of all our members is extended to William Colloton, of the Free Press staff, whose wife died a couple of weeks ago, after an illness of only a few hours' duration. A large family is left to bereave their loss.

An effort is being made this month to round up the foreign printers in the city. There are Galicians, Doukhobors, Germans, Icelanders, French, Russian and Polish. What a tower of Babel we shall have, to be sure, when they are all introduced into our happy circle!

A large number of old country cards and one German card, together with a number from the south, were presented at our last meeting. Most of their owners are holding down the sidewalks.

Ex-President Burgess has gone into camp. Tommy is sergeant major in one of our militia companies.

Sergeants W. Yuill, J. A. Nix, O. Anderson and W. Simpson, all members of No. 191, are to be seen three times a week at the rifle range. They are qualifying for places on the team which annually shoots at Bisley, England, for the king's prize. Sergeant Yuill was at Bisley last year.

Quite a number of our members will visit Toronto during convention week.

Vice-President Hunter is chairman of a committee which is investigating the apprentice question.

H. St. Vrain Johnstone, formerly treasurer of Montreal Union, and latterly of Toronto, has accepted a situation on the Free Press.

Leo Sullivan, formerly of Halifax, N. S., who performed on McIntyre's monoline during the past year, has accepted a similar situation at Cranbrooke, B. C.

Secretary-Treasurer Moore and Corresponding Secretary Trotter were given an increase in their salaries at our last meeting. JOSEPH BURGESS.

BUFFALO, N. Y.

Elks' week brought an immense crowd of people to this city. Among the many delegates were quite a number of printers. Sam Gosnell, the popular foreman of the Syracuse Post-Standard, was around hobnobbing with friends for a couple of days. Elmer Carlin, foreman of a Wheeling (W. Va.) paper, was also on deck. P. J. Gaudy, who formerly held cases on the old Courier, and is now running a job plant in Port Jervis, N. Y., represented his local lodge, and had a good time hunting up old acquaintances. There were a number of others whose names I can not recall, but who just stopped long enough to say "Hello, Bill."

Death has again entered our ranks and carried away Harry Smith and Joseph Norton. Harry Smith served his apprenticeship on the News, and was beloved by all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance. Joseph Norton was well known in Rochester, Syracuse and other eastern cities. His death was very sudden, he being in the best of health up to two days before he was stricken. His remains were taken to Syracuse for interment.

Toronto's approaching convention is drawing a large number of tourists to this vicinity.

Barney Merrigan was in our midst for three or four weeks. He presented credentials proving that he was a charter member of the Missouri River pirates.

Digitized by Google

El Paso lodge of Elks arrived here with a non-union band of Mexicans. A row was precipitated by them winning a prize, their entry being protested by the union musicians.

Joe Carroll, after years of service in the Times chapel, has left to join the Holly chapel.

The marriage of Willie Atwill occurred during the month, and, after an extended eastern trip, he and his better half are back in Buffalo. Mr. Atwill's many friends are showering congratulations.

A rumor is in circulation that No. 9's famous diplomat, Stephen Galvin, is thinking of retiring to his farm in the neighborhood of Erie, Pa.

Toronto will likely be flooded with a goodly number of Buffalo prints during convention week. We have heard that Willie Kelly is rehearsing his men for the chorus of "Tim Toolan."

Dell Angell renewed old friendships and printed for a number of weeks, but we are not metropolitan enough for Bedelia now, so he hied himself away to a livelier city. A reunion was held between him and Dell Barnes, of Toledo.

Michael O'Connor's sudden death caused considerable astonishment here. He drew his card and left for Syracuse. The next night word was received of his demise.

Eddie Seymour, of Cleveland, took in the parade. Edward is very enthusiastic over Cleveland, but is threatening to make a trip to the west.

"Mugsy" McGraw is located in Buffalo at present.

Colored citizens, representing fourteen states, and calling themselves the "Niagara Conference," held a convention here. A vigorous protest was declared against the practice of white men hiring negroes during a strike, and then letting them shift for themselves after the trouble is over.

Niagara Falls Union loses two members of its organization who were well known to Buffalo printers. Messrs. Lovett and Mahoney often visited here when the localites held outings. Both were comparatively young men, and the announcement of their death will be heard with genuine sorrow.

A pressman answered an ad recently. The proprietor informed him that he wanted a pressman that would set some type when not busy around the press, and offered the magnificent salary of $7 a week.

The hold-up men in the traveling squads have been turning a few tricks here of late that are disgusting to every lover of square dealing. It is about time that some of these offenders were made examples of. In other trades they send members to a quiet retreat, but our craft seems to be terribly sensitive about taking any action against the professional "square man."

Considerable discussion is going on about old-age pension or life insurance for our members. While nothing feasible appears in sight, a vast amount of good will come out of these fests. It is too bad that the oldtimers did not start something of the kind in the earlier days of the organization. However, it is never too late, and we believe that at some future date the International Typographical Union will have a proposition that will appeal to all. On a recent visit of one of our high officials to a neighboring city, in conversation with some of No. 9's members, he declared himself pretty strongly along this line.

Julius Lowell has resigned his position as a traveling ink salesman. Mr. Lowell and Amos (Doc) Beebe have formed a partnership and purchased a job plant, and will blossom out as full-fledged proprietors. As both gentlemen are hustlers there is no question of their ultimate success. They announce that they will be the first firm in this city to concede the eight-hour day.

William Kennard, after foremanizing in Scranton and other cities, is now located on the Times.

A summer calm seems to be hovering over Buffalo. Not a strike on in any of the local unions.

The factory inspectors of this district appear to be attending to their duties. They are after the bakers in hot shape, and are righting many abuses that have been overlooked for years.

We hear that the Convention Club, of St. Louis, has dwindled down to the unlucky number thirteen. Don't let that stop you, boys; there is nothing in omens, and you are sure of a good time.

Hereafter all the printed matter of No. 9 will bear the cut of the Printers' Home. This idea is an excellent one, and the proposal emanated from Hugh Wallace. Mr. Wallace believes that we should let the public know about our great institution.

W. A. COYELL.

PITTSBURG, PA.

Trade is not nearly so good here just at present, a falling off in all lines of the business having occurred.

Many new faces appear at our monthly business sessions. Our new president, Chambers M. Leighley, will follow along the same conservative road as his predecessor, if guessing at actions to present date are a criterion.

Traveling cards are very popular in July and August. We bid "bye-bye" to several during the heated season, but expect to shake again about latter part of September, just "when the swallows homeward fly."

Quite a bunch from here will hustle for Pittsburg in 1906. Such brothers as James Culley, Charles Q. Lafferty, Edw. Kennedy, Fred Klein, Thomas Stewart, William Newlon, and others, will be among the first arrivals at Toronto, and we fully expect them to persuade a majority of the delegates that Pittsburg, 1906, is the right and only proper vote to cast.

Buttons proclaiming our eight-hour day are being worn all over town, much to the chagrin of some few leaders of the typothetæ, and right here would be a good place to inform readers of THE JOURNAL that the offense of which the Times was guilty will not be tolerated in this city again. The publishers' association have been so notified by No. 7.

The article on page 73 of the July JOURNAL was rather amusing to some of us here. Mr. Gordon, of Glens Falls, N. Y., seems to labor under the idea that the letters published are from the pens of the secretary-treasurers of the several places. In Pittsburg it is not the case, and from what I read in THE JOURNAL (and I read it about all) I have come to conclude that many letters are written by independent correspondents. Let me suggest that the secretary-treasurer of each local union read carefully each monthly letter, and such items as "A Kick" will scarcely ever find place in the columns of our ever welcome monthly union "paper book" of good things.

At last, and very properly, too, it has been decided to celebrate Labor day by a monster parade, and at the conclusion each with his family or sweetheart will hie himself to Luna Park for a general good time during the remainder of the day and evening. This will, we believe, go a long way toward our success in bidding for the eight-hour day. Let each member of No. 7 arrange to take part in the parade. A little tramping will do you good (some of us have tramped ties), and the cobbles will be cleaned especially for that occasion.

The rule on "jumping" has been very vigorously attacked. Much discussion on the matter was indulged in at the July meeting, it being brought about by three leaving machines on the Dispatch. Many think that men toiling on this paper get the worst of the matter, on the only English union paper in town. On the other papers a man can "jump" and nothing is said about a $5 fine, but on the Dispatch he "puts up" the coin or he don't work. Does look a little unfair, does it not?

George Bradley, in a very neat speech, thanked the committee and members of No. 7 for the recognition-of-service gift he received on retiring from the office of president. He says Mrs. B. appreciates the fob and charm as much as the one to whom it was given.

"Gene" Flynn carries a label in his hat that is just a little typical; it reads thus:

A camel can go eight days without a drink, but who in the h——l wants to be a camel?

It is certainly amusing to see some of the newspaper publishers and bosses in job establishments "rubber" at the eight-hour buttons. One prominent Pittsburg newspaper man got so close to mine I began to look around for a place to lean, for the gentleman is very heavily built and might have leaned just a little strong.

The labor statistics just published are certainly of interest to us. In the report of troubles during the fiscal year just closed it is shown that over two-thirds of the strikes in this country were lost. It teaches us much. A strike should always be the last resort, but only too frequently is it the first thing thought of. The report cites the New York subway strike as one of the most important lost by the hasty declaration of it. I never could understand why so many union men get so outrageously hot-headed on very slight opportunity; ofttimes cool heads are in the minority and are compelled to suffer because the non-conservative member wants "strike" and must have it. Now when our eight-hour demand is so much on our mind let us be careful. A chance has already been given us to learn and profit—the St. Louis example is one for thought in advance, and great good should be the outcome all over the land where the International Typographical Union flag and principle has seen fit to plant itself.

We neglected a matter of much importance in our last letter. Our old friend, William Mills, is a benedict. Some time ago the intimation went along this line, but "Bill" was mum. We all wish the newly wedded couple long life and happiness coupled with prosperity. HARRY C. CAMPBELL.

SPARTANBURG, S. C.

Spartanburg, South Carolina. Most of you never heard of the place before, but we will try and introduce ourselves by telling a little good news. We hope to have good news every month—just a little, perhaps, but enough to keep in line with other locals in the march to the front.

We have succeeded in getting a scale signed which is satisfactory to all parties concerned. We did not get all we asked for, but we did get recognition of the union and an agreement giving us extra pay for all kinds of extra work. There has never been but one scale signed here, and that was several years ago. At the time it was presented only one man signed it. Since that time conditions in at least two of the shops have been both good and bad. Both of the daily papers have been "ratted" at different times, but were afterwards opened and filled with union men. Our scale went into effect on July 3, 1905, and continues until December 31, 1905. At the expiration of the present scale, which calls for nine hours, fifty-four per week, there is very little probability of trouble in getting the eight hours agreed to by all of the proprietors.

The following is taken from the Spartanburg Journal of July 3, the day the scale was signed:

A scale of prices has been agreed on by the employing printers of Spartanburg and the local typographical union for the ensuing six months. The scale is entirely satisfactory to all parties and was brought about without trouble or friction of any sort. The best of feeling prevails between the local printers and their employers. The grade and quality of work done in Spartanburg, both in newspaper and job printing, will compare favorably with that done anywhere. The typographical union is controlled by reasonable and conservative policies and while taking care of the interests of its members due consideration is shown for all circumstances and for the interests of the employers.

The proprietors have been led to believe that the International Typographical Union convention at Toronto will modify the eight-hour law and extend the time when it shall go into effect. They told us that they were of this opinion, and while we explained the reasons why it should not be changed under any consideration, we found it best to make the scale effective until December 21, 1905. This opinion, however, has been formed by outside advices, and we intend that they shall learn of the action of the convention at Toronto in regard to the eight-hour movement.

We were fortunate in having the able assistance and advice of James Leonard, of New Orleans, general organizer for the United States of the

Digitized by Google

American Federation of Labor, who is also a member of New Orleans Typographical Union No. 9. Mr. Leonard came here in the interest of the American Federation of Labor just as we were about to submit the scale of prices adopted by this local, and while he did not achieve the success which his efforts merited in behalf of the American Federation of Labor, he did us faithful and much-appreciated good. Mr. Leonard also injected new life into the carpenters' organization. Mr. Leonard is accompanied in his travels by Mrs. Leonard, who, when conditions make it possible, is a valuable assistant to Mr. Leonard in organizing label leagues.

Business here is good, with plenty of help to do the work.

We expect within a short time to have several new members from nearby towns, and will be in good shape to get eight hours on January 1, 1905.

ITHACA, N. Y.

Eight hours for work!
Eight hours for sleep!
Eight hours to do as we please!

No. 379 can report progress.

At our June meeting the following officers were elected: President, Edward Nevins; vice-president, M. J. Watkins; secretary-treasurer, J. Wesley Tree; recording secretary, W. S. French; sergeant-at-arms, William Rible. The executive committee is composed of Messrs. Watkins, Hasenjager, Stover, Shultz and McCrey.

Chairmen of the different chapels should not forget to remind the slow ones when collecting dues that it takes nearly seventeen years' dues to the International to pay for the International Typographical Union burial benefit alone.

No. 379 had the honor of entertaining the delegates to the state allied printing trades, which met at Ithaca July 11-13. A banquet was given at Alberger's, after which the evening was given over to toasts, speeches, etc. M. J. Watkins, of No. 379, acted as toastmaster, and welcomed the delegates as only Watkins can, after which he introduced the first speaker, President Thomas D. Fitzgerald, of the state allied printing trades. President Fitzgerald spoke in a most interesting manner of the history of the allied trades, its reason for being established, its work, etc., and Nate Newman, of New York city, also spoke, and amused all present by his amusing stories. James A. Lavery, of Poughkeepsie, spokè on the state federation, as did also "Dad" Nevins, No. 379's president, on local affairs. Duncan C. Lee, of the News, made an interesting address. The committee on arrangements was composed of Messrs. Watkins, Tree, Rindle and Shultz.

As a result of the allied trades' stay with us No. 379 will continue to boom the label, and place Ithaca in line with our neighboring cities.

THE JOURNAL is looked for and read with interest by the membership of No. 379.

The typothetæ circulars have begun to reach Ithaca, but with all but five printers in the city members of No. 379, the bait don't work.

THEODORE HASENJAGER.

COFFEYVILLE, KAN.

Time upon time has elapsed since any news has been sent in for publication in THE JOURNAL from No. 578, and we are sorry for the fact, for it might lead the other subordinate unions to believe that we are a "dead one." But No. 578 is not deceased; it is far from it. We are one of the liveliest small unions in the country, and the flourishing condition that exists makes the boys glad they are members of No. 578. Business is good for this time of the year, and most of the home guards are kept busy printing. Taken all in all, Coffeyville Union No. 578 is in a class by itself when the pink of condition is considered.

The new officers of No. 578 for the ensuing term are: President, Mylo G. Karr; vice-president, J. W. Phillips; secretary-treasurer, John A. Reeds; recording secretary, Rolla J. Conderman; sergeant-at-arms, "Hunky" Marsh.

No. 578 has subscribed to the Cummings memorial fund.

Frank Rector, formerly with the Daily Journal here, is in town. He has been operating a machine on the Muskogee Times for several months, but quit that job a few weeks ago when the proprietor refused to sign the wage scale. He used to be our secretary-treasurer.

Organizer P. J. Boyle was in Coffeyville the first of July, on his way to nearby towns to try and organize unions. Mr. Boyle is a very pleasant gentleman, and those of us who met him are glad to have his acquaintance.

Charley Carter, at one time president of our union, is now operating the Joplin Globe's new jumbo machine.

Frank Tew, an oldtime card man, is foremanizing the Record office now.

No. 578 boys have been having high times lately in the amusement line. A street fair, animal show and cheap Sunday excursions are among the list. The president is in favor of having a good old-fashioned picnic before the summer goes by.

We expect to "bunk" in the eight-hour bed after January 1, 1906.

MYLO G. KARR.

IN REPLY TO MR. M'COY.

Mr. McCoy must have been thinking of big-hearted Big Six and other large unions when he said "the local unions should be obliged to take care of their own sick." How can a union of twenty-five members do so, except by co-operation, as is done by the Home? And there are many less than that number. One who is sick needs nursing chiefly, and that is what is obtained at the Home; better nursing is obtained here than at most hospitals and at most homes. All a union can do is to pay for a member at a hospital. A pension is all right for one who is not sick, but a sick person needs a home where he can be attended to. I do not believe there is any home where a person can get better attention than here, and I am sorry to say there are plenty of homes where he would get little, if any, attention, and a pension, in such a case, would not be anything like an equivalent. The Home is a life-saving institution for the young who are sick and an asylum for the aged, and should not be abolished. Ask those who have been residents of the Home through sickness. The case of one who is not sick is different; a pension in such a case would, perhaps, be more appropriate, because it would enable those to stay among their friends who wished to, and it would enable those who are married to receive the benefit without separation, which they would have to submit to now in order to enter the Home.

The question of the aged is a larger one than Mr. McCoy makes provision for. Since the advent of the machines a man over fifty years has little chance of getting employment. The cry is for higher wages and shorter hours, and this means more work in a given time; only to be accomplished by the young and the strong. But a pension list for those over fifty years of age would require a Carnegie for an exchequer, which would certainly abolish all risk of him being guilty of the sin of dying rich. The real question is, How can we give the greatest benefit to our sick and old members? Consequently, we can not ignore those who arrive at the age of fifty years.

Denver Union No. 49 has a scale of $20 a week, but they allow a member who is fifty-five years old to work for $15, not more than one in each office, and providing he has been a member of said union for five years. In special cases, the limit of five years is not enforced; but it is put into the rules to prevent an influx of fifty-five-year-olders from the outside. If this reduction is necessary in Denver, and I think it is, it also applies to other unions, and it should be an International law, applying to all unions alike, for the protection of old members, not allowing subordinate unions to neglect their interests, as they do now by the absence of such a provision. I suggest as a law:

"That members fifty years old may work for 15 per cent less than the regular scale for time work, and that members fifty-five years old may work for 25 per cent less than the regular scale for time work.

"Provided, that not more than one can work under the scale in any one office, unless such takes the place of an apprentice."

There are some of that age who can get the scale, and this would not interfere with them, but would only apply to those who can not, and would also tend to lessen the number of apprentices. It is a suggestion to make a provision for members over fifty years of age. Those over sixty years of age, with a stated period of membership in the International Typographical Union, should be entitled to a pension.

I fail to grasp Mr. McCoy's idea when he speaks of "Secretary Bramwood placing the average age at death of our membership for 1904 at 45.5 years." To get an estimate for a sufficient pension fund for members over sixty years old, is to get the numbers of those who survive the age of sixty, and then see what sum is required to pay them $5 each per week. His figures might appear reasonable, and be acceptable to some, but facts might prove them to be an illusion. The expenses of the Home are limited to the extent of its capacity. When there is no vacancy, applicants have to wait for one. Not so with a pension. Each one entitled would have to be treated alike. The only question to find out is the average number of living members over sixty years of age, and then the rate per capita can be easily fixed. Why does Mr. McCoy speak of monthly payments? Would he like his wages to be paid monthly? Aged members should not be kept waiting a month, but should be paid weekly through their local unions. The International Typographical Union might make a monthly settlement with each union. Drop this monthly talk, and say weekly.

At the Home, from June, 1904, to May, 1905, there were 19 deaths—14 from tuberculosis, 1 from Bright's disease and tuberculosis (making 15 in all from tuberculosis), 2 from paralysis, 1 from anæmia and old age, and 1 from insanity. The ages of the above were: 23, 24, 33 (2), 34, 36, 39, 40 (3), 44, 45, 48, 55, 57, 60, 64 (2), 70.

From Mr. McCoy's standpoint, all the above, except four, would be left to the tender mercies of an uncharitable world. Instead of which they were treated with the tenderest care and received burial that would do credit to any one in the middle class of life.

During the year seventeen who came suffering from tuberculosis vacated, able to work—2 were in the incipient stage, 12 were in the first stage, and 3 in the second stage. The periods of their stay at the Home ranged from three weeks to two years.

Their ages were: 24, 25, 30 (2), 31, 32, 33 (2), 35 (2), 36 (2), 38, 39, 41, 42, 45.

Not one of the above was sixty years of age.

During the same period 12 vacated improved. Their ages were: 32, 37, 40, 44, 45, 46, 48, 50, 53, 62, 64, 78. All except 3 of the above were under 60 years of age, showing that the Home has proved a blessing to the young as well as the old, to which may be attributed the fact that they are alive today and able to do their part in the battle for existence. Since the establishment of the Home there have been 165 deaths, 108 of which were from tuberculosis, most of whom were under the age of 60 years.

We number about 50,000 members, which, at 5 cents each per week, would realize a fund of $130,000 per year. One cent a member per week for 52 weeks in a membership of 50,000 would produce $26,000. Five dollars a week would cost $260 a year; 100 members would cost $26,000 a year; 500 would cost $130,000, just 5 cents per member per week for 50,000 members. I question if the number of those entitled would reach 500, which would provide for extra working expenses. Recipients should be required to have 20 years' membership and be not less than 60 years old, so that a member joining at the age of 40 or under would be entitled at the age of 60; if a member joined at the age of 50 he would not be entitled to benefits till he was 70. This would be an incentive for members to join early and retain their membership, as well as act as a preventive against their giving it up. Those under 60 years of age, who have been members for 20 years, and those who joined immediately on coming out of their apprenticeship, with a membership of not less than 5 years, if totally disabled from earning a living, might be allowed the option of coming here, or receiving the pension, and staying among their friends to live, or to die; thereby saving traveling expenses to the organization.

The executive would have to be the consenting power as to recipients. Each union could collect the 5 cents from each member and pay its own members, sending the surplus to headquarters, from which they would get any deficiency. Example: A small union having a pension member and collecting $3 per week would receive $2 per week from headquarters. Another union, larger, having a pension member and collecting $7 a week would remit to headquarters $2 for each week. Monthly accounts could be kept, unions sending a balanced report with finances, so that deductions and additions could be made at headquarters, and the same system be carried out as now. Each union could pay itself and remit the rest. A recipient of the fund could go among his friends to live, or to die, and be in charge of the union nearest to him, from whom he would draw his money.

If the amount was collected for two years before putting the scheme into practice a substantial reserve fund could be created, and the interest would add to the income.

THE PENSION SYSTEM.

I have read with a great deal of interest the detailed statement concerning a plan of pensioning old printers presented by Mr. McCoy, of New York. His scheme is plausible—if. The great big "if" that will gnaw at the very vitals and destroy the foundation of Mr. McCoy's plan is the size of his fund. Large funds are always, at some time or other, dissipated. Besides, he wants to maintain the old printers on a pension of $20 a month, the money to be secured from interest on the invested fund, so as not to impair the principal. Who will pay this interest? Manifestly persons not members of the union. That is to say, the old printers will be maintained by persons who are not printers at all and who have nothing in common with our profession.

Mr. McCoy propounds a series of questions, and asks printers to write for THE JOURNAL concerning his plan. Personally, I believe in a system of old-age pensions, but do not believe in the adoption of a plan that would do away with the Home for Union Printers. Not because the Home is located in Colorado, and I am a western man. Far from it. But my reason for favoring the maintenance and enlargement of the Home is because that is the best and most economical method of caring for our sick and indigent members. Mr. McCoy asks the question, "Whether the average aged man would prefer $10 a month outside the Home to $30 a month expended on him in it?" Fortunately there is at hand some data on this very point. It comes from a government publication, No. 2300, Daily Consular Reports, Washington, July 5, 1905. In this number F. W. Goding, United States consul at Newcastle, New South Wales, presents a report on old-age pensions in New South Wales, which I think should be reprinted in full. Here it is:

Among the claims made for the New South Wales old-age pension act, prior to its passage, were that (1) it would lessen the number of indigent persons in the various state institutions; (2) it would remove much worry on the part of people growing old as to provision for the future; (3) it would have a tendency to encourage relatives to assist in the support of the aged, thereby avoiding the reflections usually cast upon them when aged relatives become objects of charity, and (4) it would ultimately diminish the taxation required under the old system. The act was passed and has been in operation some five years. The labor members of the federal parliament, desiring to pass similar laws, appointed a commission to inquire into the results obtained from the New South Wales act. Among those who testified before this commission was the director of government asylums for the infirm in New South Wales, who stated, in substance, that about six months after the act came into force, 600 old people secured their pensions and left the benevolent asylums; that the majority returned to the institutions and surrendered their pensions, there now being almost as many inmates as there had been prior to the passage of the act; that the reasons given for returning were that they were better cared for in the institutions and could live more comfortably there, and that the annual cost of maintenance per inmate at the asylums was $80. From the statement made by the state treasurer it appears that the amount expended for the old-age pensions last year exceeded $2,500,000, while the amount necessary to support the infirm was greater than ever before, yet the population had not materially increased.

I think that the above will also partially answer one of Mr. McCoy's other questions, "whether the superannuated member with a home circle cares to leave it, and whether a Home benefits a proper percentage of the aged," as well as the one as to the "opposition average superannuated members have toward entering a Home."

The last question on which Mr. McCoy seeks enlightenment will remain in the realm of conjecture until after it is tried. He wants to know if the membership would stand an assessment of $1 a month for a year and a permanent increase of 15 cents a month afterward to maintain the pension system. Personally I believe that the members would gladly stand it if it was decided that it was necessary. High dues or big assessments never destroyed any labor union on earth. High dues and big assessments have sometimes attracted dishonest members, who had themselves elected to official positions where they could steal the funds that high dues and assessments accumulated, resulting in wreck of unions, but the mere fact that the general membership pay good round sums into the general treasury never disturbs the numerical growth, except, perhaps, to augment it for a time. But I don't believe it necessary to levy the assessment at all in order to maintain a good, all-round pension system. Mr. McCoy wants to accumulate over half a million dollars, endanger it by loaning it out, and then with the interest, added to 15 cents a month collected from the members, pay $20 a month to about 400 indigent members. What's the matter with foregoing the collection of the big fund, raising the per capita tax 20 cents a month, and from this sum pay 400 indigent members $20 a month? This is only 5 cents a month more than he wants to collect anyhow, and it seems to me much the safer plan. Or perhaps it would be better still if we proceeded to conduct the pension system at actual cost and collect no more. If it costs 10 cents a month per member, collect that. If the cost was double this sum, or even more, collect it and pay the bills, but don't attempt to do it by a financial system that has wrecked every moneyed family in history except the Rothschilds, and it's even going to get them in time.

A FEW AMUSING ERRORS.

A few years ago a St. Louis policeman, in an encounter with a burglar, was shot and badly wounded, and soon after died from his injuries. A Cincinnati editor wrote for his paper, "The St. Louis officer who was killed in a fight with a burglar is dead." The compositor changed the word "killed" to "wounded." When the editor's revised proof came back, the word "wounded" was stricken out, apparently in anger, and the word "killed" substituted, and thus the sentence passed through the edition. Even a policeman, after he has been killed, is certainly dead for all time to come.

Another editor on the same journal wrote, "The Zoo has just received another installment of wild animals." The intelligent comp., perhaps not accustomed to the abbreviation of the Zoological Gardens, set it up: "The 200 has just received another installment of wild animals."

A lady writer on a Cincinnati paper wrote it, "As Abraham Lincoln once said, 'I would rather be right than be president.'" Perhaps she had never heard of Henry Clay, the author of the quotation, many years before Lincoln became prominent in politics. J. Q. ADAMS.

NEW LONDON, CONN.

At our July meeting (July 1) our members had the privilege and pleasure of listening to an address by Organizer Scott. He gave us a report of the conditions existing throughout New England, and especially in Connecticut. The report was extremely gratifying to all of us, and every member present appreciated Mr. Scott's remarks and his company, and before adjournment expressed their pleasure in a rising vote of thanks to him.

New London now has a larger membership than ever before in its history—thirty-five members. Every printer in the city who is eligible is a member. In addition, we have two apprentice members, with more to come shortly. We look out for our boys, believing that the best way to make good union printers s to take the boys under our wing and look out for them.

On August 1 we will present our new scale to the various proprietors for their signatures. We expect to have our requests granted, and on September 1 report that No. 159 is in the eight-hour column.

From reports received by the writer, the state convention held in Hartford on June 15 has been the cause of stirring up quite a lot of enthusiasm, and much organizing work is being done. At our next meeting, to be held in New Haven in September, we expect a larger attendance and better reports from delegates.

At our July meeting the following officers were elected: President, John F. Murphy; vice-president, Harry Tidgwell; secretary-treasurer, Robert Tarring; recording secretary, Samuel C. Hawman; sergeant-at-arms, George A. Risley. We have one feature in our union not practiced in any other, viz.: Our president is not allowed to serve two terms, and is always elected to the lowest office, sergeant-at-arms, on the completion of his term. Organizer Scott installed the new officers and made a few appropriate remarks on the occasion.

As the time before the eight-hour law goes into effect is getting short, it behooves us to get out and work harder for its success. Let every member of the International Typographical Union stand shoulder to shoulder and put forth his best efforts to win. We have laid our plans, and we must keep to them, and, at the same time, do our utmost to increase our membership and strengthen any weak spots we may see. ROBERT TARRING.

A COMPARISON.

After reading the July JOURNAL and noting the fluctuations of the percentage of "increase of cost" to the employing job printer, I was prompted to make a little illustration and draw the "deadly parallel" and ask our friend Macintyre if it is not true. Having been a foreman in a job plant for a number of years, where I had to do all the figuring on work, I think I am capable of the suggestion. The following is taken verbatim from an old estimate book and is based on a scale of $18 per week of fifty-four hours. It is a job of 5,000 eight-page folders, 5x8 inches, and printed on ordinary book paper.

Composition, nine hours, at 33⅓c per hour	$3 00
Presswork, 5,000 impressions	5 00
Ink	1 00
Folding, trimming, stapling, etc	5 50
Stock, 40-pound book, at 6c, 90 pounds	5 40
Cost of job	$19 90

I usually added a good percentage for "incidentals," which included power, taxes, insurance, light, heat, etc., which, in the ordinary three- or four-man shop would be about 40 per cent of the cost of production outside of the cost of paper stock. A plant of five or six men could and can be run with the same incidental expense, which would reduce the percentage on each job produced, therefore making the cost to the consumer less. Now, take the same job under the eight-hour basis, which would be 42½ cents per hour, the only increase in the cost of production would be the difference of nine hours' work at 33⅓ cents per hour and 42½ cents, which is the enormous sum of 83 cents, and the employers tell us they must raise their prices all the way from 20 to 25 per cent. My deduction is that this job would not have cost me as much under eight hours as under nine hours, for I would have more than saved that 83 cents in the day on an hour's light, power, heat, etc. (incidentals).

If this illustration is faulty and does not come up to the system of some of the employers, I stand corrected. It is a system I used with success for a number of years, and usually brought the goods.

I am out of the job printers' ranks now, having gone into the ad rooms for less hours and more money. While the ad man will tell you that the pace is hot, I find it no hotter than in job rooms. Give the job man eight hours—his just due—and the chances are you will find a better class of job men then than now, for some ad men will be induced to go back to the job rooms, for we all know there is a certain fascination about job printing that appeals to the astute printer.

The book and job scale in Pueblo is now $20 per week for forty-eight hours.

Pueblo, Colo. F. H. SIMPSON.

THE PANTAGRAPH AND "INDIVIDUAL LIBERTY."

Heine once said, in alluding to the Balaam incident, that he had never heard an ass speak like a man, but that he had often heard a man speak like an ass. It is the editorial quoted in last month's JOURNAL from the Bloomington (Ill.) Pantagraph, in opposition to the shorter workday, which revives the recollection of this remark of the great German satirist.

The eight-hour proposition is that the printer should receive the same pay for eight hours' labor that he now gets for ten hours, as the Pantagraph counts the present working day. It is not perceived how the printer is deprived of his liberty by such an arrangement, or that the productive energy of one-fifth of his time is "delegated to oblivion." The two hours so gained will be employed by the printer in recreation or improvement, and he thus gains just so much time for his benefit instead of that of his employer. This argument (?) is too ridiculous to require refutation.

The second so-called argument is only a repetition of the first. It assumes that the printer will lose one-fifth of his wage, and consequently a fifth of the comforts of life, which assumption is totally false.

The last paragraph is the most stunning of all. We are informed that a man who waits "for the hour of eight before he will take up his tools commits a sin against heaven's light and sunshine," etc., in eloquentious discourse. As if he could not read the papers or write letters or play with the children or tend to his garden or do something else useful before beginning a day's labor. I had always thought that heaven's light and sunshine and pure air were more likely to be found out of doors than in the lead-laden atmosphere of a printshop. He calls this rest from labor to "narrow the powers," and says that "the more work the more enjoyment." To be consistent he should maintain that one should work fifteen hours a day and have no Sundays or holidays.

Evidently such an harangue as this is not intended for the boys at the case, but to make the Pantagraph editor solid in other quarters.

In my last communication reference was made to a meeting here of employing printers of the southeast, with the intimation that they perhaps were considering the eight-hour matter. I have since learned that this was a meeting of the lithographers of this section, and that their proceedings had nothing whatever to do with the eight-hour question.

Senator Charles A. Rothenberg—a weighty title, but the wearer is big enough and strong enough to bring to the office both credit and honor. Charlie has been elected senator from Tennessee for two years in the supreme body of the National Union, which meets this year in New York state, and at this writing he is attending that meeting, with hopes of being able to be in Toronto at the time of the International Typographical Union convention. Many friends are glad to congratulate Senator Rothenberg upon being elected to this high position.

Aul, who was chairman of the committee on arrangements, seldom fails to get what he goes after, and the success of this boat ride was due in large measure to his untiring efforts. The ladies themselves are workers, and on this occasion they spared no effort or energy to give their friends and patrons a pleasant evening.

Death has again laid a heavy hand upon the membership of No. 20, the unfortunate victim this time being Donald Howell, aged about thirty-five years, whose death occurred on July 1 at Red Boiling Springs, Tenn. Mr. Howell came here from Clarksville, Tenn., several years ago. He was a man of fine character, and therefore made and retained many true and steadfast friends. In the demise of Mr. Howell the union lost one of its stanchest members. His remains, accompanied by Messrs. Gill and Roberts, of No. 20, were shipped to Clarksville, where they were laid at rest in beautiful Greenwood Cemetery. The body was met in Clarksville by Messrs. Clifton and McManus, of No. 20, and Tarpley, Patterson and J. L. and C. L. Perkins, who acted as pallbearers.

No. 20 is after the rural printers in middle Tennessee. A campaign has been started whereby the union will secure the names and addresses of every non-union printer in this section of the state, and effort will be made to secure their applications for membership. The work is under the supervision of President Hill and O. J. Thrasher, chairman of the business committee.

DECATUR, ILL.

To illustrate the unanimity with which No. 215 regards the eight-hour agitation it is only necessary to cite the following instance: The dues of this local are $1.50 per month, with a rebate of 75 cents for attendance at meetings. At the June meeting it was moved and carried that we suspend the rebate for three months. This was done so that the union would have sufficient funds on hand to send a delegate to the eight-hour conference at Chicago and two to the convention of the Illinois Allied Printing Crafts' Union at Peoria. The union also allowed all three delegates their railroad fares, hotel bills, and $5 per day for the time absent. The vote on both propositions was unanimous. Harry M. Scott was the delegate to Chicago, and L. L. Underwood and T. B. Lindsay to Peoria. Both conventions were enthusiastic.

The Herald composing room has been divided into two "jurisdictions," having a machine foreman now in addition to the form juggler. The machine foreman hires and fires the operators, and the makeup the floormen.

W. L. Hall enjoys the distinction of having served five terms as president of No. 215, being now on his sixth successive year. His last four elections have been unanimous.

At the July meeting a change in the constitution was presented providing for the collection of dues on the percentage system. This will no doubt pass and is a step in the right direction.

The extracts from the San Francisco dailies published in the July JOURNAL are indications of the direction in which the wind is setting in 'Frisco, and are body blows to the employing printers of that city.

MAILERS' TRADE DISTRICT UNION.

According to the list of delegates already printed, the mailers will have the largest delegation to a convention, both International Typographical Union and trade district union, that ever attended at any time. I understand there will be many visitors from the mailers' unions also, and a good time is expected.

A decision was recently made by the executive board in the appeal case of Doerr vs. Chicago Union. I received notice that Brother Doerr intends to appeal to the convention.

Vice-President Kinsley, of the trade district union, will be in attendance at the convention, together with Charles Hedrick, who has represented Chicago at the last three conventions.

Many tangible questions are to come before the trade district convention, and a very busy session is anticipated.

The secretary-treasurer's report shows that most all the locals are in good standing with the trade district union, an increase in membership by the inception of the new locals, and a very nice sum in the treasury, all things considered.

Boston local recently lost one of its first members in the person of Thomas F. Ryan. He was a member almost from the inception of the union, and took important part in its early existence.

President Mulcahy, in his recent visit to all the locals in the east, made an impression with all the members with whom he came in contact, and poured forth some valuable information as to the workings of the trade in the various localities.

SIOUX CITY, IOWA.

Through J. H. Strief, secretary of the Iowa State Federation of Labor, it is learned that J. W. Close, of Dubuque, who was elected vice-president of the Iowa State Federation of Labor at its recent annual convention at Council Bluffs, will remove from the state and take up his residence in Wisconsin, where he has accepted a position as mechanical expert and constructing engineer for a creamery company, at a much more inviting salary than anything the newspaper business affords in Iowa. Mr. Close is a stanch union man and his loss will be felt in the movement in Iowa. For the past few years he has been a linotype machinist and foreman on a Dubuque paper. He is a natural mechanic and knows the printing business thoroughly. He has acquired a reputation as a master of the linotype, and his new position affords him a wide field for his talent. That he will succeed no one who knows him doubts. Mr. Close, in departing, also will sever his connection with Dubuque Typographical Union as president, and in the same capacity with the central labor body of the city of Dubuque.

I am in receipt of a constitution and prospectus of the Eight-Hour League of North America, from William M. Campbell, of St. Johns, N. B. While I am in sympathy with and a direct beneficiary of the eight-hour day movement, I would be loath to enter an organization which sought to place upon the statute books a universal eight-hour law, and, without looking up the question thoroughly, will state that it can not be constitutionally accomplished in this country. Not so long ago men, women and children worked twelve, fourteen and even sixteen hours per diem. If ever there was necessity for statutory enactment along shorter workday lines it was then, and not now. So why waste effort? The universal eight-hour workday is evolving; it is not far distant, especially for printer men. I believe we are doing the most and the best that can be done for the furtherance of the eight-hour day. Let us not swap horses in the middle of the stream by trying to inculcate false principles of government, Mr. Campbell. Let us accomplish the task we have undertaken. When successful there will be others to follow in our footsteps.

Charles Klise, an oldtime Sioux City printer, but for ten years a St. Louis linotype operator, spent a month's vacation in Sioux City. Mr. Klise, on account of poor eyesight, quit the printing business for a year and was a hotelkeeper at Hot Springs, Ark. His eye trouble having been corrected, he went back to St. Louis with the intention of again applying his skill to the linotype.

George B. McCaslin, who is well known in St. Paul, Minneapolis, Omaha and Lincoln, of whose paralytic misfortune I made mention some time ago, is now wholly incapacitated from work. He recently met with an accident on a street car line, while visiting in Omaha. His necessities are being charitably attended to by an assessment by the union.

Dell Van Dyke, of Seattle, who, eleven years ago, set up and put in motion the machines of the Sioux City Journal office, is making a visit here and in Chicago. Dell is a native Sioux Cityan and learned his trade in the Journal office. He now holds one of the best situations on the Pacific coast, having charge of twelve machines of the Seattle Times. Dell was the cause of quite a number of Sioux City printers going to the coast.

"Mickey" Hickey refuses to migrate—at least for a while. He has a job and has provided himself with a goodly portion of the habiliments of a gentleman of esthetic taste. He now contemplates taking advantage of the cheap rates to the east to make a visit to his home in Jersey City.

Fred Johnson and Leighton Lawrence are two Sioux Cityans who have gone Pacific-coastward, and are at present stopping in Denver, while Gene Ingman is touching the celluloids on the Omaha News. "Kid" Coe, a perpetual traveler, has just struck town; there are others, and verily the migratory birds do migrate. A. D. SCOUGAL.

HUNTINGTON, IND.

Edward Ruby, carrying a traveling card from Springfield (Ill.) Union No. 177 in his pocket, was found unconscious alongside the tracks of the Wabash railroad in this city on Thursday evening, July 13, about 7:30. Two physicians and Coroner Morgan were immediately summoned. Upon examination they found that his skull was badly crushed, allowing his brains to ooze out, and pronounced the injured man beyond help. Two hours later he died. It is supposed that in attempting to alight from the moving train he leaped out too far, striking the corner of a box car standing on another track and hurling him under the wheels of the moving train. This is doubted; several of No. 454's members holding to the opinion that he was robbed and pushed off, as no valuables were found on his person excepting his traveling card. The body was removed to Stults' morgue and the officers of No. 454 notified. Word was immediately sent to George Hoole, secretary of No. 177, by Hugh Butler, business manager of the Herald, who made the initiatory effort to locate the dead man's relatives. In answer to a second telegram Mr. Hoole wired that the dead man's relatives resided at Lexington, Ky., but telegrams to the chief of police and W. W. Hoagland, secretary of the Blue Grass Union, elicited no information. Sunday morning's mail brought a letter from Frank H. Stierheim, of Springfield, that the deceased's home was in Maysville, Ky., but word came from the mayor of that city saying no person of the name of Ed Ruby was known there. An item appeared in the Indianapolis Star the morning after the accident, giving an account of the affair. It was seen by a friend of the Ruby family in that city, who clipped and forwarded it to his sister in Madisonville, Ky. On receipt of the clipping the latter took it to Clint Ruby, of that city, and he immediately telephoned Coroner Morgan at Huntington for particulars, as the description given fitted his brother. Sunday morning at 11:06 Mr. Ruby arrived in Huntington and identified the body as that of his brother, whom he had not seen or heard of for three years. Arrangements were then completed for shipping the body to his former home in Madisonville by the 1 P. M. train. Failing to obtain any definite information regarding deceased's family, the officers of No. 454 made arrangements to inter the body here Sunday, but in the hope that something might be learned of his family, it was finally concluded to only hold services over Ruby's remains and delay interment until Monday, the body being in a good state of preservation. Accordingly the officers and members of No. 454 assembled at Stults' undertaking rooms Sunday morning at 9:30 and held services over the remains of the deceased, Rev. C. C. Beatty, a train dispatcher on the Erie railroad, officiating. Secretary Bramwood was informed of Ruby's death Saturday and claim made for the International Typographical Union death benefit. Sunday morning a check was received for the amount, which was turned over to Clint Ruby upon his arrival here. It took just twenty-four hours from the time the letter was sent until the receipt of the check. Secretary Bramwood was prompt, to say the least.

CHARLES E. BOYD.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL.

At the last meeting of No. 177 the following scale of prices was adopted and presented to the bosses, being a raise of $2 all around, with eight hours, to go into effect August 25: Night—Machine, $21; hand, $19. Day—Machine, $19; hand, $18. Overtime, price and one-half.

Edward Ruby, who left this city recently in company with "Tony" Pastor, was killed by being pushed from a train near Huntington, Ind. When Mr. Ruby left this city he was known to have $21 in his possession, but when the body was found there was nothing on his person but his traveling card. It is the impression he was robbed and pushed off the train by unknown parties. Mr. Ruby was a native of Kentucky, and the body was taken there for interment.

The supreme court of Illinois recently upheld the union label and trademark law. Counterfeiting the cigarmakers' blue label was the cause on trial, and the fine of $100 and costs inflicted by the lower court was sustained. Score again for the "little joker."

James Updegraff, who has been confined in a hospital here for two months, suffering from nervousness, has gone to the home of his brother in Kansas City, somewhat improved in health, but unable to work.

J. B. Markham and John Sankey are recent appointees of the mayor. The former is "one of the finest" patrolmen in the city, and the latter is water tax collector. Mr. Jones, printer expert of Illinois for the past four years, is also a member of the typographical union, and the chances are good for Mr. Jones' reappointment.

A man who can set 9,000 ems an hour on a machine in a saloon and only 4,000 an hour in a printing office is classed by G. V. (Checker) Grow as a "vocal operator." Parker's "mail order" printers don't beat this.

Phillips Brothers are now located in their mammoth new building. It is one of the finest in the city, and in its construction the sanitary conditions were the first consideration. Now, if some others would—.

A section in our laws which prevented members from working at both hand and machine on the same day was recently repealed.

Two new Mergs will be installed in the State Register office in the near future. Now, don't all flock to Springfield in hopes of getting a "sit." Enough at present.

State printing has fallen down. Several recently laid off have sought new "worlds to conquer."

Will we be able to say, on January 1, 1906, "We have met the enemy and they are ours"? I hope so. A "long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether" works wonders.

Printers in this city take great interest in items appearing in THE JOURNAL relative to Battle Creek's (fence) Post. If Mr. de Bruyn could investigate Post's life here, his native town, it would make one of the most interesting stories ever appearing in THE JOURNAL.

Even the honey bees in this section belong to the union. A storekeeper displayed a crate of honey with a union label on. Bees are certainly strong and touching in some parts.

Scott Gordon's article entitled "A Kick" in the July JOURNAL hits the spot. An item recently appeared in this correspondence which said, "There is work for all who want it, and 10r some that don't," and it brought a letter from a member in Ohio who was "a good job, ad, rule and figure man, sober and reliable." I sent an answer stating if he was here he could probably "catch on" for two years' work. He came, and a job was ready for him. After ten days vocalizing in the gin mills, he left town, with two dark spots under his eyes as a memento of his working (?) days here.

"Work, for the night is coming when man's work"—will be done in eight hours.

Boom the label. F. C. REED.

IOWA CITY, IOWA.

No. 515 contemplates the organization of a woman's auxiliary, a committee now having this matter in charge. Our lady members are enthusiastic on the subject, which means that it will be carried through to a successful finish.

An eight-hour day does not seem to be very much of an improbability to at least one of the Iowa City offices, as the employes of the Economy Advertising Company have been working on this basis on Saturdays for some time past. This is the largest printing and bookbinding house in the city, and in thus voluntarily making this concession has won the good will of a large and liberally-paid force of employes. Speed the time when the eight-hour day will grow into such favor that it will include all the offices in the city and the remaining days of the week.

The usual midsummer dullness has settled down lightly upon us, just in time to permit the boys to take short vacation and fishing relays. However, we regret that this slackness in trade may entail some hardship on the traveling members of the craft who visit our city in their touring cars, as it will render the task of securing funds to refill their reservoirs more difficult.

Secretary-Treasurer Burger is spending the summer down on the beach. The genial secretary was much disappointed in being compelled to forego his proposed boat ride in honor of Vice-President Fairbanks, when the latter gentleman delivered the commencement address at Iowa University.

No. 515 has elected the following officers for the coming year, the president and vice-president having been chosen to fill their respective offices for the third time: President, John J. Keppler; vice-president, E. W. Johnson; secretary-treasurer, Albert Burger; recording secretary, H. Klima; sergeant-at-arms, L. W. Obenchain; members of executive committee, Frank P. Burns and Art S. Anthony; auditing committee, O. A. Moler, Bert Miller and J. D. Lonergan. The officers have the cordial support of the members and a spirit of fraternity and harmony prevails throughout. The dignified, conservative course of No. 515, since its organization, has done much to advance the cause of unionism and reflect credit upon organized labor in this community.

GEORGE F. O'BRIEN.

CHARLOTTE, N. C.

No. 338 has a fight on its hands with the Queen City Printing Company. The trouble arose over the employment of a New York non-unionist, Paul Freyborg, alias Albert Freyborg. By agreement he was to be discharged July 1, the master printers' association guaranteeing this. H. A. Murrill, president of the company, did discharge him, but had another non-union man put to work at once. When the union printers and pressmen walked out, Murrill re-employed Freyborg. No. 338, with fifty members, is assessing each one $1.10 weekly to support the strikers, and is receiving the usual International Typographical Union benefits. A number have been deported. Organizer Hill, of Nashville, was sent here twice by President Lynch, but failed to settle the trouble. He worked hard, and left the boys greatly encouraged over the outlook. John J. Williams, an active union leader, was arrested upon a warrant sworn out by the company, charging him with "enticing labor" away from said company. He waived examination, and his trial is to come up at the next term of the superior court.

The hope of the employers is in getting the pressmen back to work. These say that if ordered back they will quit as individuals. They are assured of financial support by our International.

We ask that all efforts be made to keep printers and pressmen away from here. It is a fight for existence, not only of this union, but of neighboring unions. Greenville, S. C., employers have announced that if Murrill defeats the printers they will "open" their shops. T. M. ALEXANDER.

THAT amid our highest civilization, men faint and die with want is not due to the niggardliness of nature, but to the injustice of man.—Henry George.

In Memoriam

JOSEPH F. NORTON.

At the last regular meeting of Buffalo (N. Y.) Typographical Union No. 9 the following resolutions were adopted on the death of Joseph F. Norton:

Resolved, That No. 9, in the death of Joseph F. Norton, loses one of its most estimable members. In his departure from our midst we lose one of the old guard, an excellent printer, one whose heart was always to a brother in distress, and that we accord to the loved ones he left on earth our most sincere condolence and sympathy.

Resolved, That the charter be draped for thirty days; a copy of resolutions sent to the family; that they be spread upon the minutes of No. 9, and a copy transmitted to THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL for publication.

G. W. BRICE.

Washington (Pa.) Typographical Union No. 456 expresses sympathy in the following resolutions:

Whereas, Our oldest brother, George Washington Brice, died on June 9, 1905; therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is with most profound sorrow that we, his fellow members of Washington (Pa.) Typographical Union No. 456, hear of the demise of our friend and brother, who has always held our respect and esteem in life, and whose death removes from our midst the one man whose life has extended from the hand-set times before the war to the present machine age.

Brother Brice was always a stanch union man, was a member of the International Union early in its history, and was one of the first to join No. 456 when it was organized, and while unable to do any labor of late years, yet he was always interested in unionism, and was, all in all, a first-rate man, whose presence among us will be sorely missed.

Resolved, That our charter be draped for a period of thirty days.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be copied in our minutes and published in THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL.

P. F. FENTON.

At a meeting of Joliet (Ill.) Typographical Union No. 194 the following resolutions were adopted in memory of the late P. F. Fenton:

Whereas, Patrick F. Fenton, recently deceased, was a member of Joliet Typographical Union No. 194, and one of its most honored and devoted members; therefore, be it

Resolved, That No. 194 take this method of expressing to his relatives and friends its unceasing admiration for and its unqualified appreciation of his character; that the exceptional purity and nobility of his conception of life has at all times been the inspiration of his friends and made it impossible for any man to call him an enemy; that the faith in which he died has acquired a luster from his membership which should indeed be precious to its adherents; that his courage and ability, if unhampered by insidious disease, must have lifted him high in the affairs of men; and be it

Resolved, That we, who knew the rare scrupulousness which governed every action of his life, however trivial, and that we who were proud to call him friend and honored by calling him brother, refrain from offering to his relatives and friends unmeaning condolences, feeling that their knowledge of the fact that we knew him and loved him well may help to lighten the burden of sorrow that so heavily oppresses the home that shall know him no more; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be presented to the relatives of our deceased friend and brother, published in the daily papers and inscribed upon the records of this union.

CHARLES O. COMPAGNIOTTE.

The following resolutions were adopted by a rising vote by St. Louis Typographical Union No. 8, at a regular meeting held July 2, 1905:

Whereas, Providence having removed from us our fellow workman, Charles O. Compagniotte; therefore, be it

Resolved, That by his death we have lost a generous, genial man, a faithful friend, and one who, during his many years' association with our union, has proved himself a true and worthy member.

Resolved, That to his relatives we extend our heartfelt sympathy in their hour of trial; and, be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be placed upon our minutes and a copy sent to the relatives of the deceased.

WILLIAM HAMILTON.

Woman's Auxiliary No. 5 (Indianapolis) adopted the following resolutions:

Whereas, It has pleased Almighty Providence to call from our midst on April 1, 1905, William Hamilton, husband of our member, Mrs. Hamilton; and,

Whereas, In memory of the worthy dead and for the comfort of the bereaved we feel called upon to offer expressions of sympathy; therefore, be it

Resolved, That we hereby extend to the bereaved family our sincere and heartfelt sympathy; and, be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be spread upon the minutes, a copy sent to THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL for publication, and a copy sent to the family of the deceased.

CHARLES ALLAN.

Jacksonville (Fla.) Typographical Union No. 162 adopted the following resolutions on the death of Charles Allan:

Whereas, It has pleased the All-wise Ruler to remove from among us our brother member and fellow laborer, Charles Allan, and

Whereas, The membership of Jacksonville Typographical Union No. 162 has lost a true friend and faithful worker—one who was always ready to aid a fellow member and advance the welfare of the union at any and all times; therefore, be it

Resolved, That Jacksonville Typographical Union sympathizes with the members of the deceased brother's family; that these resolutions be published in the Jacksonville press, THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL, a copy sent to his family, a page set apart in the union's minutes, and the charter of this union be draped for a period of thirty days in his honor and memory.

JOHN W. ARBOGAST.

Resolutions of condolence adopted June 8, 1905, by Wichita (Kan.) Typographical Union No. 148, on the death of John W. Arbogast, who died June 4, 1905:

Whereas, The Great Reaper of all mankind has again visited our ranks and garnered a golden sheaf in the person of John W. Arbogast, a highly appreciated fellow workman; and,

Whereas, The life of our deceased brother was crowded with acts of love, kindness and faithfulness toward all who came under his immediate control, and as a craftsman true to union principles; therefore, be it

Resolved, That the members of Wichita Typographical Union No. 148 express their deep regret for the loss they have sustained in the death of Brother John W. Arbogast, and with sad hearts tender to the cherished companion, idolized daughter and sorrowing relatives our deepest sympathy, fully realizing that their loss is even greater than ours; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be presented to the faithful wife; that they be spread on the minutes of the union, and a copy furnished to the local press and to THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL.

Resolved, That our charter be draped for a period of thirty days.

MRS. BENJAMIN KELLERSTRASS.

The following resolutions were unanimously adopted at the last meeting of Peoria (Ill.) Union No. 29:

Whereas, The great Creator has seen fit to remove from the family circle the wife of our fellow workman, Benjamin Kellerstrass, thereby casting a gloom over the entire family; and

Whereas, In the death of Mrs. Kellerstrass the family circle has lost a devoted mother and guardian; therefore, be it

Resolved, That the members of Typographical Union No. 29 extend to our fellow workman and the bereaved family our heartfelt sympathy; and, be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be presented to Brother Kellerstrass and the bereaved family and that the same be published in the Labor Gazette, THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL, the daily papers, and a copy be spread upon the records of the union.

ROBERT EMMET GRIFFITH.

Wilmington (Del.) Union No. 123 adopted the following resolutions on the death of R. E. Griffith:

Whereas, It has pleased the All-wise Father to remove from our midst Robert Emmet Griffith, one of our respected fellow craftsmen, who died July 4, 1905; and,

Whereas, Robert Emmet Griffith had endeared himself to the members of Wilmington Typographical Union No. 123; therefore, be it

Resolved, That the members of Wilmington Typographical Union No. 123, and the union as a body, deeply regret the demise of the late member, and extend our sympathy to the family of the deceased; and, be it further

Resolved, That the charter of this union be draped in mourning for thirty days, and that these resolutions be published in THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL, and that a copy be sent to the family of the late Robert Emmet Griffith.

HARRY SMITH.

At the last regular meeting of Buffalo (N. Y.) Typographical Union No. 9 the following resolutions were adopted on the death of Harry Smith:

Whereas, Death has again invaded our ranks and removed from our midst our esteemed brother, Harry Smith, in the very zenith of his youthful manhood; and,

Whereas, In his demise Typographical Union No. 9 loses a faithful and worthy member, his associates a sincere friend, and his family a devoted husband and father; therefore, be it

Resolved, That we hereby extend to the family of our departed brother our sincere and heartfelt sympathy in this their hour of bereavement; and, be it further

Resolved, That in respect to his memory the charter of this union be draped in mourning for thirty days; a copy of these resolutions be sent to the stricken family; that they be spread upon the minutes of Typographical Union No. 9, and a copy transmitted to THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL for publication.

Official Budget

THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL

ISSUED ON THE FIFTH OF EACH MONTH.

AT ROOMS 640-650 NEWTON CLAYPOOL BUILDING, INDIANAPOLIS, IND.

J. W. BRAMWOOD, Editor and Publisher

Entered at the postoffice, Indianapolis, Ind., as second-class matter.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.—One dollar per annum to any part of the United States or Canada; foreign, $1.50 per annum; single copies, 10 cents each.

To insure prompt insertion, all official matter, communications and advertisements should reach this office BEFORE the TWENTIETH OF THE MONTH PRECEDING PUBLICATION.

Advertising rates made known on application. All letters and remittances should be addressed to the editor and publisher.

NOTICE TO SECRETARIES.

Items for the official columns of THE JOURNAL should be prepared on a separate sheet, and the style of the paper followed as closely as possible. Such items should not be made a part of a letter dealing with other subjects, for if this is done the items are likely to be overlooked, even though the greatest care be exercised. Write as plainly as possible—especially proper names—using one side of the sheet only. Communications must in all instances be accompanied by the author's name and address. All official matter must be in the hands of the editor BEFORE THE TWENTIETH OF EACH MONTH, to insure insertion in the issue immediately following. The observance of the foregoing will tend to insure what is desired by all—promptness and accuracy in the publication of official matter.

THE JOURNAL MAILING LIST.

When a member requests a change in his JOURNAL address, he should give the name and number of the union with which he is affiliated, together with his present and former address.

Additions to the mailing list can only be made when received through the local secretary. Members not receiving the magazine should furnish the local secretary with their addresses.

Additions, corrections or alterations reported by local secretaries should be kept separate from other correspondence. When a member deposits his card, and his name is reported for the subscription list, the secretary should state where the member previously received THE JOURNAL, and give the name and number of the union with which he was affiliated. When a member draws his card, is suspended or expelled, or in any manner ceases to be an active member of the local, the secretary should request that his name be dropped from the mailing list.

A large number of those who take cards and remove to unorganized towns fail to renew their cards. To prevent loss in such instances, it has been decided that members holding cards, and located outside of the jurisdiction of a local union, must either deposit their cards with the nearest union and pay dues each month, or pay International dues in advance, in order to get THE JOURNAL. Where a card-holder pays his dues to the local in advance, a specific report should be made by the secretary upon the case, in order that the name can be placed on the list and the magazine sent to the member for the time for which dues have been paid.

The 25th of each month is the latest date upon which changes for the succeeding issue can be made on our mailing list.

Upon request, secretaries will be furnished with a copy of the list of their members to whom THE JOURNAL is being sent.

All correspondence regarding THE JOURNAL should be addressed to J. W. BRAMWOOD, Newton Claypool building, Indianapolis, Ind.

UNIONS IN ARREARS JULY 25.

Section 1, article ix, of the constitution, requires that: "International dues for each month shall be collected by subordinate unions and transmitted to the secretary-treasurer of the International Typographical Union before the twentieth of the succeeding month." Under this law the June per capita of all unions was due at headquarters not later than July 20. The following unions were delinquent on July 25, having failed to make their returns.

In this connection attention is directed to section 7, article vi, of the by-laws, which is as follows:

"Sec. 7. No funeral-benefit claim shall be allowed unless the deceased was possessed of a current working card at the time of his death, nor shall a funeral-benefit claim be allowed if, at the time of death, the union of which deceased was a member is in arrears for per capita tax to the International Union."

LABOR UNIONS.

Some newspapers and individual lecturers contend that labor unions are a menace to society, one pulpit orator in this city going so far as to call them the Anti-Christ. Even the diamond has its flaws, and all things of human origin are apt to be more or less imperfect, and every society, no matter what its object, has the fellow with the dull ax within its ranks.

Here are a few of the good points of unionism: First, the gathering together of workers of every calling or craft; second, the elevation of its members, socially, intellectually and morally; third, a fair day's pay for a fair day's work; fourth, to use every honorable means to secure better conditions of hours and labor for wage-earners. The well-paid workman is a poor subject for the socialist or anarchist agitator to work on. No chain is stronger than its weakest link, and no nation can advance in civilization when its common people are oppressed. The labor union teaches its members independence, sobriety and self-respect. Impress these qualities upon a man, and the heritage of liberty and free institutions, handed down to us by our ancestors, will not suffer at their hands, and there would be less use for the poorhouse, jail, or whipping post.

One of the union's missions is to look after hours and wages; the bosses will see that the men do enough work every day. The union man would like to taste the joys of heaven after death, but thinks a little of them would come in handy here on earth while he is waiting.—Philip J. Weise, in Pennsylvania Grit.

MR. DOOLEY ON THE OPEN SHOP.

(With Apologies to P. F. Dunne.)

"Whut is all this talk that's in the pa-apers about the open shop?" asked Mr. Hennessey. "Why, don't ye know?" said Mr. Dooley. "Raally, I'm surprised at yer ignerence, Hinnissey. Shure, 'tis star-rted be sich patriots as Dave Parry, Fred Job an' President El-yut of Har-rvard t' bust up th' la-abour unions. They are afraid, Hinnissey, that th' la-abour unions will over-run this grand an' glorious counthry of ours, an' there wud be no wan left t' arganize into Citizens' Alliances an' Business Min's Associashuns. An' so they boost th' open shop. Whut is th' open shop? Shure, 'tis a shop where they kape th' dure open t' accommidate th' consthant sthream of min comin' in t' take jobs cheaper thin th' min whut has th' jobs. 'Tis like this, Hinnissey,—suppose wan of these free-barn Amerycan citizens Dave M. tills us about is wurkin' in an open shop for th' princely wages of wan large iron dollar a day of tin hours. Along comes another free-barn son-of-a-gun, an' he sez t' th' boss: 'I think I cud handle th' job fer ninety cints.' 'Shure,' sez th' boss, an' th' wan-dollar man gets th' merry, jinglin' can, an' goes out into th' crool wurld t' exercise his inalienable roights as a free-barn Amerycan citizen an' scab on some other poor divil. An' so it goes on, Hinnissey. An' who gets th' benefit? Thrue, it saves th' boss money, but he don't care no more for money than he does for his roight eye. It's all principle wid him. He hates t' see his min robbed of their indepindence. They must have their indepindence, reghardliss of inything ilse." "But," said Mr. Hennessey, "these open-shop min ye minshun say they are fer th' unions, if properly conducted." "Shure," said Mr. Dooley, "if properly conducted. And there ye ar-re. And how wud they have thim conducted? No sthrikes, no rules, no conthracts, no scales, hardly iny wages an' dam few mimbers." "'Tis a foine mon t' wur-rk in an open shop," said Mr. Hennessey. "An A. P. A.," said Mr. Dooley.

WHAT THEY THINK OF THE JOURNAL.

George B. Masterson, Chester Pa.—"With each issue The Journal improves, and there is not a dry page in the publication."

A. S. Andrew, Pueblo, Colo.—"I enjoy The Journal immensely, and believe every issue better than the previous one."

J. Bradshaw, New York city—"The Journal is a hummer. It gets better all the time."

J. D. Isaacs, New York city—"The Journal is a most welcome visitor, and I look for its monthly appearance more and more."

International Stereotypers' and Electrotypers' Union

NOTICE.

BOSTON, MASS., July 17, 1905.

To the Members of the International Stereotypers' and Electrotypers' Union:

GENTLEMEN—At the St. Louis convention the Committee on Laws recommended that all propositions intended for said committee should be sent in advance to the next convention, so that the committee may take up its business early in the session.

The recommendation was adopted, and all parties having such propositions will please address them to the International Stereotypers' and Electrotypers' Union Committee on Laws, Brand's hall, Clarendon Hotel, North Clark and Ontario streets, Chicago, Ill.

The Clarendon Hotel will be headquarters for the delegates while the convention lasts.

For any information regarding accommodations, etc., please address Joint Convention Committee of the Chicago Electrotypers and Stereotypers: L. P. Straube, chairman, 134 East Van Buren street; Oscar Baer, treasurer, 1596 North Sacramento avenue; John Kamin, secretary, 2617 West Chicago avenue.

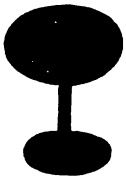
The Man Behind the Button

IS a missionary for the good of his organization. Every one who sees the little emblem on the lapel of your coat is made to think. And the first thing he thinks is probably this: "Here is a man who is proud of the fact that he belongs to the printers' union." If every member of the I. T. U. would wear a button, don't you know it would be a great influence for good? You say you never wear a button of any kind?

Why Not Start Now?

And wear the button that represents more to you than any other button could? The I. T. U. Button stands for everything that the label represents, and it can be made almost as great an influence for good. It's of a neat design and is finished in heavy rolled gold. No handsomer button is made—and it costs but 50 cents. If you won't wear a button, then why not send for a pair of the

I.T.U. Link Cuff Buttons?



They are exact reproductions of the button and are finished in the same material—AND THEY ARE HARD TO BREAK. $1 will get them for you. But perhaps you have plenty of cuff buttons, or maybe you don't wear cuffs. Then you had better send for one of the

I.T.U. Stick Pins

These are made in a uniform manner with the lapel buttons and the links. They make attractive scarf pins and are especially suitable for our lady members. 50 cents each.

The Monotype

A Proverb at Fault

THAT it is "only a bad workman who complains of his tools" may be a proverb, but it is also arrant nonsense. ¶ On the contrary it is the good workman who insists on having tools which are effective and easily kept in order. ¶ Thus, therefore, it is the competent operator who, above all others, recognizes the merit of THE MONOTYPE as compared with any other machine purporting to accomplish the same result. ¶ THE MONOTYPE alone is modern and on that account the operators' favorite.

The Century

HOW A RIGID IMPRESSION HELPS A PRESSMAN

FIRST, by saving his time and labor. With a rigid impression, between bed and cylinder, every tissue paper he places on his makeready will count. With a rigid impression he will find that his heavy overlay will not throw out his light overlays and necessitate his continuing to make ready until he has them both equalized.

Second, a rigid impression (a stiff squeeze) sets the ink to the paper quicker, renders less ink necessary, makes it possible to run the press at higher speeds on a high quality of work.

The old-fashioned idea of an elastic impression, which is embodied in the principle of the side-rod construction, is becoming as obsolete in the minds of progressive pressmen as the use of the felt blanket. Therefore our claim for rigidity of impression in the Century are worthy of the attention of every practical pressman.

Our Cylinder is completely enclosed, heavily braced throughout the inside, and in large sizes has 5-inch journals.

Our Cylinder is raised and lowered by the Eccentric Lift Impression Mechanism (the most positive raising and lowering mechanism known to mechanics), the journal boxes of which are encased solidly in the massive side frames.

Our Automatic Compensator always holds both journals against the upper or work side of their boxes. The blocks of this compensator are supported by heavy coiled springs and take up automatically any and all wear or variation which may develop. For the above reasons a Century Cylinder never gutters.

The bed is heavily ribbed and cross ribbed and rests on a series of steel track rollers set closely together, after a method which precludes wear upon the ways, and these track rollers run upon four 4-inch steel-shod tracks.

The tracks are supported by a single cast girder under the line of impression which is at least one-third stronger than that of any other press.

The Century of today is the only press on which you can save so much time and work in making ready. When once made ready, it stays made ready.

ENTERED AT THE POSTOFFICE, INDIANAPOLIS, INDIANA, AS SECOND CLASS MATTER
ISSUED ON THE FIFTH OF EACH MONTH

VOLUME XXVII September, 1905 NUMBER THREE

REVIEW OF THE TORONTO CONVENTION.

THE fifty-first convention of the International Typographical Union was called to order in the Labor Temple, Toronto, Canada, at 10 o'clock on the morning of Monday, August 14, by Chairman Stevenson, of the arrangements committee, who invited the following gentlemen to take seats on the platform:

Rev. Bernard Bryan, an ex-printer.
Hon. J. P. Whitney, premier of the Province of Ontario.
Thomas Urquhart, mayor of Toronto.
Alderman J. J. Graham, chairman of civic reception committee.
Professor Goldwin Smith.
Robert Glockling, president International Brotherhood of Bookbinders.
Edward Randall, first vice-president International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union.
John McVicar, of Detroit, ex-president International Typographical Union.
John Armstrong, ex-president International Typographical Union and president of ex-delegates' association of Toronto.
Edward M. Meehan, president of Toronto Typographical Union.

Mr. Stevenson welcomed the delegates in behalf of the local organization and felicitated the International Union upon the wiping out of all geographical lines in the trade union movement.

President Meehan took the chair and invited Rev. Bernard Bryan to offer the invocation.

All of the speakers who had been invited to the platform addressed the convention in words of welcome and encouragement, and they were all heartily applauded.

President Meehan then presented a handsome gavel to President Lynch, who took the chair and responded briefly to the words of welcome.

Secretary-Treasurer Bramwood reported that the credentials of 252 delegates had been filed with him, of which number three were irregularly elected and one came from a delegate whose union was in arrears. The secretary-treasurer recommended that the credentials of the irregular delegates be referred to the credentials committee, and the recommendation was concurred in. The number of delegates was later increased to 260.

President Lynch then administered the obligation to all delegates.

By motion of Delegate Draper (Ottawa) the hours of the daily sessions were fixed at from 9 to 12 A. M. and from 2 to 5 P. M.

Delegate Smith (Philadelphia) asked unanimous consent for the consideration of a resolution granting the privileges of the floor to officers, ex-officers and organizers, but objection was made and the president ruled the resolution was not in order until permanent organization was effected by the appointment of officers and committees.

The chair then announced the following appointments:

Assistant secretary—George J. Knott, of Chicago Typographical Union No. 16.
Reading clerk—James Monroe Kreiter, of Washington Typographical Union No. 101.
Sergeant-at-arms—George W. Dower, of Toronto Typographical Union No. 91.
Messengers—William Powell and Ernest Webb, of Toronto Typographical Union No. 91.

The above officers were then obligated.

President Lynch then announced the following committees:

Committee on laws—Johnson (Washington), McKee (New York city), Creager (Springfield, Ohio), Johnson (Memphis), Vander Perel (Denver).
Committee on credentials—Comerford (Buffalo),

Godkin (Hartford), Eagleden (Windsor), Marcy (Marlboro-Hudson), Birkedahl (Denver Mailers).

Committee on returns and finances—McLogan (Detroit), Crowley (Pueblo), Carlin (Wheeling), Donnell (Cincinnati), Hartnett (Troy).

Committee on appeals—Draper (Ottawa), Jordan (Nashville), Ames (Toledo), Larson (Chicago), Kennedy (Pittsburg).

Committee on Union Printers' Home—Brown (Topeka), Seffing (Cleveland), Damer (Mobile), Cantwell (Montreal), Freeman (Salt Lake City).

Committee on eight-hour day—Hayes (Cleveland), Throssell (Newark), Crammond (Toronto), White (San Francisco), Kennedy (Minneapolis).

Committee on TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL—Levery (Poughkeepsie), Carpenter (Elmira), Sullivan (Cincinnati), Klaus (St. Paul), Tolan (New York city).

Committee on resolutions—Nock (Birmingham), Burlington (St. Joseph), O'Connor (Louisville), Schleif (Richmond), Black (Sioux Falls).

Committee on subordinate unions—Croft (Galveston), Cherry (Indianapolis), Senker (Scranton), Hearns (Grand Rapids), Brewer (Toronto Mailers).

Committee on officers' reports—Ripley (Omaha), Robinson (Los Angeles), Slemons (Terre Haute), Quirk (Albany), Alford (Manila).

Committee on Los Angeles Times contest—Snyder (Colorado Springs), Barnum (Washington), Spead (Lowell), Austin (Portland), Needham (Des Moines).

Committee on arbitration—Hartman (Baltimore), Mullen (Tri-City), Croft (Boston), Lovett (Charleston, W. Va.).

Committee on organization—Green (Atlanta), Wolfe (Columbus), Maulsby (Tacoma), Aide (Kansas City), Tardif (Montreal).

Committee on allied trades relations—Soverino (Fall River), Shaffer (Harrisburg), Shultz (Decatur), Kupke (Chicago Mailers), Buchanan (New York Newswriters).

Committee on government ownership of telegraph—Saltus (Worcester), Gude (Springfield, Ill.), McKibbin (Sioux City), Purnett (Butte), Dwyer (Niagara Falls).

Committee on government ownership of type foundry—West (Brockton), Crowe (Lexington), Schultz (Elizabeth), Kinner (Bradford), Rhodes (Danville).

Committee on press—Doyle (Boston Newspaper Writers), Sandow (Wilkes-Barre), Sullivan (Lafayette), Alter (Williamsport), Kipp, (Columbus Newspaper Writers).

Committee on label—Barnes (Chattanooga), Dirks (St. Louis), Habecker (Fort Wayne), Alford (Providence), Conklin (Charleston, S. C.).

Committee on report of federation delegates—Kuhnholz (New Orleans), O'Brien (Lawrence), Bender (Roanoke), Hanley (Hamilton, Ont.), Finley (New York Mailers).

Committee on miscellaneous business—Bandlow (Cleveland G. A.), Suydam (Springfield, Mass.), Grier (Wilmington), Calvert (Fort Smith), Colgan (Augusta, Maine).

Committee on thanks—Hertenstein (St. Louis), Mowbray (Streator), Wilcox (Peoria), Martin (Peterborough), Reilly (Dallas).

Committee on copyright—Coffey (Lincoln, Neb.), Maydwell (Meriden), Leigh (Trenton), Gray (Aurora), Pierce (Muncie).

Committee on union label on text books—Moore (Fort Worth), Forbes (Jersey City), McCurdy (Houston), Scanlon (Syracuse), Jerrard (Winnipeg).

The president then announced the committee that had been appointed to meet with the press telegraphers, as follows: William E. Orser, of Rochester Typographical Union No. 15; A. H. Blain, of Seattle Typographical Union No. 202; T. F. Kane, of Boston Typographical Union No. 13; Emmett Whealan, of Chicago Typographical Union No. 16, and Charles J. Buehler, of Milwaukee Typographical Union No. 23.

The president also explained that the several delegates from Philadelphia had been excused from committee duty at their request.

Delegate Smith (Philadelphia) again asked unanimous consent for the consideration of a resolution granting the privileges of the floor to officers, ex-officers and organizers, but objection was made. The delegate then moved a suspension of the rules, but was declared out of order. The delegate then introduced a proposition (Proposition 65) to amend the by-laws so as to grant said officers the privilege of the floor. The proposition was referred to the committee on laws.

The Philadelphia delegation then submitted the following proposition:

Proposition No. 64—By the Philadelphia delegation:

Whereas, Philadelphia Typographical Union No. 2 has for over fifteen months been engaged in a life-and-death struggle with the Philadelphia Inquirer; and

Whereas, The success of the eight-hour day in a competitive district comprising over 60 per cent of the total membership of the International Typographical Union is dependent, to a great degree, on maintaining the integrity of Philadelphia Typographical Union No. 2, which can be accomplished only by sustaining the fight which Philadelphia Union is now carrying on.

Resolved, By the International Typographical Union, in fifty-first annual convention assembled, That we emphatically endorse the fight now being waged by Philadelphia Typographical Union No. 2 against the Philadelphia Inquirer; and, be it further

Resolved, That the executive council be and the same is hereby instructed to place at the disposal of the Philadelphia Union, immediately after return to headquarters, the sum of $7,800, this sum being due Philadelphia Union under a fair and equitable construction of both the Washington and St. Louis agreements between the executive council and Philadelphia Union, provided that Philadelphia Union, out of this sum, shall reimburse those of its sister unions who have contributed financial support; and, be it further

Resolved, That the executive council be and the same is hereby instructed to continue financial assistance to Philadelphia at the rate of $200 per week until the Inquirer fight is won or until the next convention, provided that Philadelphia Union contribute at least an equal amount and that the fight be conducted under the supervision and direction of the executive council, itemized vouchers being furnished that body by the local union for all moneys expended, and the work to be in charge of an International representative to be selected under the terms of the Washington agreement; and, be it further

Resolved, That the executive council be and the same is hereby instructed, in case the eight-hour fight or any other circumstances drain the International Typographical Union treasury to such an extent as to endanger the continuation of the Philadelphia campaign or the regular work of organization, to submit to a vote of the referendum a proposition for an extra assessment in such amount and for such length of time as may be deemed necessary by the executive council to meet the contingency.

The foregoing was referred by President Lynch to the committee on appeals.

Delegate Kreft (Philadelphia) submitted a resolution that the committee on appeals be directed to report the above proposition back to the convention not later than Tuesday at 2 P. M.

Chairman Draper (Ottawa), of the committee, asked for an extension of time, and after some discussion the resolution of Delegate Kreft was lost.

President Lynch then called Vice-President Hays to the chair and took the floor as the representative of the executive council. He stated the executive council had been charged with "stabbing No. 2 in the back"; "rendering aid and succor to the rats in their fight against the union"; with being "in league with the rat employers and rat printers of Philadelphia," etc., etc. If the charges were true as made, the executive council was not fit to carry on the eight-hour movement, nor fit to conduct the business of the union; there was no middle course; they were either union or non-union; and if not union they had no business in the chairs. The papers in this case were in the hands of the delegates and embraced in Proposition No. 1, an appeal by the council. On behalf of the council he earnestly requested an early disposition of the appeal presented.

Delegate Johnson (Washington, D. C.) moved that the committee on appeals be instructed to take up Proposition No. 1, the appeal of the executive council, and report Tuesday morning if possible.

[Proposition No. 1, above referred to, is the appeal taken by the executive council from the action of Philadelphia Union No. 2 in relation to the enforcement of section 81 of the general laws, in an instance of violation of the law called to the attention of Philadelphia Union by the council. It related to the Shelby Smith case. The proposition was before the delegates in printed form, and as it has been discussed generally by the membership at large, who are familiar with the council's position in the matter, as published from time to time in THE JOURNAL, the reproduction of the proposition here is unnecessary. The report and action in this case appears elsewhere in this issue.]

After some debate by Delegates Smith (Philadelphia), Steele (Washington) and Faries (Philadelphia), Delegate Faries (Philadelphia) moved to amend that the Philadelphia case be taken up prior to Proposition No. 1 (the council's appeal).

Delegate Kreft (Philadelphia) argued in favor of considering the Philadelphia matter first and the Smith matter afterward. A rising vote was taken and the amendment was lost by a vote of 74 ayes to 135 nays.

The original motion that the committee on appeals report on Proposition No. 1 on Tuesday or as early as possible, was then placed before the convention, and the motion prevailed.

Delegate McLogan (Detroit) moved that the officers be allowed the privilege of the floor, but objection was made by Delegates Kreft and Smith, of Philadelphia.

The president announced that members of the executive committee of the United Typothetæ were in the city, and that the eight-hour committee would meet them this (Monday) afternoon, and that President Ellis, of the United Typothetæ, would address the convention Tuesday, and Commissioner Driscoll, of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, would address the convention Wednesday.

Delegate Freeman (Binghamton) moved that the secretary of this convention be instructed to send a telegram of congratulation to the International Stereotypers' and Electrotypers' Union, in convention assembled at Chicago, Ill.

The motion prevailed, and the message was forwarded.

After the announcement of the time and place of the mectings of the several committees, the president declared the convention adjourned until Tuesday at 9 A. M.

SECOND DAY.

MORNING SESSION.

After roll call the committee on credentials reported that the irregularities in the credentials of the delegates referred to the committee were technical, and recommended that they be seated. The committee recommended that the delegate from Union No. 460, which was in arrears, be not seated until the indebtedness was settled. The recommendations of the committee were concurred in.

The committee on eight-hour day reported that it had, on August 14, 1905, met with a committee representing the United Typothetæ of America, composed of Messrs. Ellis, Macintyre, Greene, Donnelly and Nunemacher, and after a thorough discussion, had received the following proposition:

August 14, 1905.

Mr. Max S. Hayes, Rossin House, City:

DEAR SIR—As agreed at the joint committee meeting held today, I herewith send you the suggestions as outlined.

The committee from the United Typothetæ of America suggest to the eight-hour committee from the International Typographical Union that they recommend to the International Typographical Union convention, now in session, that it vote in favor of a reconsideration of the referendum vote taken last fall on the eight-hour day, and authorize a new referendum vote to be taken with the object of rescinding the resolution to make the eight-hour day effective January 1, 1906; or, if the convention is unwilling to vote affirmatively on the above, that the convention shall empower the executive council to call for such referendum vote if at any time between now and January 1, 1906, the executive council shall consider it advisable.

Sincerely yours,
JOHN MACINTYRE,
Secretary.

The committee asked that the matter be recommitted to the committee for further consideration, and it was so ordered.

President Lynch announced that George H. Ellis, president of the United Typothetæ of America, John Macintyre, secretary, and William Green, chairman of the executive committee, were in waiting and asked permission to address the convention. There being no objections, permission was granted. Mr. Ellis, president of the United Typothetæ of America, addressed the convention as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT AND GENTLEMEN—I wish to thank your executive council for the invitation to speak to you this morning on behalf of the United Typothetæ of America, to present as best I may the employer's side of the eight-hour question.

Before doing so I wish to say a personal word. In the last number of THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL is a report of a meeting of employing printers, held a short time since in Milwaukee, at which I am credited with the following:

"Mr. Ellis said it was a crime and against the constitution to make a contract with organized labor. It was detrimental to the willing non-union workers, and tended to deprive them of making a living. That he hoped they would never be under obligation to sign any agreement in the future."

This is absolutely and unequivocally false, and such meaning could not be twisted out of anything that I said. To those of you who know me I hardly need to say that I not only said no such thing but that I hold no such views.

I wish also to correct another misstatement. It has been repeatedly stated in print and in various public meetings that the officers of the United Typothetæ of America have refused to confer with your officers on the eight-hour question. This is not true. The officers of the United Typothetæ of America have not received directly or indirectly any request for a conference until within the last week, since the meeting of the United Typothetæ of America in St. Louis in June of last year. At that time a conference was held and the result of the discussion in our convention, as embodied in its preamble and resolutions, was reported to your committee. It is true that the stand taken by the United Typothetæ of America in these resolutions was so decided as to lead your president to remark that he supposed there was no use in further conference, but I think those resolutions have not been fully understood, and I would like to read them here.

"Whereas, The International Typographical Union has asked the United Typothetæ of America to declare its position upon the proposed eight-hour day, and

"Whereas, Under existing conditions any attempt to reduce the hours of labor in the printing trade would be disastrous to the employer and employe alike, be it

"Resolved, That the United Typothetæ of America declares that it is opposed to any reduction of the fifty-four-hour week; and, be it further

"Resolved, That the United Typothetæ of America will resist any attempt on the part of the International Typographical Union to reduce the present hours of labor."

That the typothetæ is not opposed to conferences is, I think, fully proved by the action of the local typothetæ of Chicago, St. Louis, Indianapolis and Detroit, who themselves proposed the so-called Detroit conference, at which, beside the local committee, your executive council and the committee of the United Typothetæ of America were present.

As president of the United Typothetæ of America it has been my duty with other members of the executive committee to attend the meetings of employing printers held to consider this question during the past few months in different parts of the country; not, as has been frequently stated, to stir up opposition to the ultimatum of the International Typographical Union, but to learn the sentiment of the employing printers on this question, and, of course, to assist in organizing such opposition if it existed; and almost without exception we found the conviction expressed that it would be ruinous to undertake to put the printing offices on an eight-hour basis in the immediate future.

This is not guesswork on the part of the employers, for they had an experience with the reduction from ten hours to nine. This reduction, as many of you will remember, was advocated by members of the Boston Typothetæ, to which I happened to belong, for several years before it was brought about by the Syracuse conference; and yet today, not only is every member of the Boston Typothetæ opposed to this further reduction of hours but every man will stand out against it; and while they now have no less sympathy with their employes and would be glad to meet their wishes, if possible, they are convinced, through experience, that the reduction is not so simple a matter as appears on the surface, that its effects are far reaching.

The theory that about as much would be accomplished in nine hours as in ten was a delusion. Not only is no more work done per hour, but the better work which it was prophesied would result has not been forthcoming, while the reduction was not merely one hour in ten, but the actual working time on a ten-hour basis being not more than nine and one-half hours on the average, with the shorter day the whole hour comes off the working time.

The claim that the introduction of machinery into the composing room makes the shorter day possible is fallacious. Not only is it impossible to do a large part of the work coming to the general office today on machines, but even on such work as can be done on them it must be remembered that the work of operatives on machines is but a part of the necessary cost of the completed composition; proofreading, makeup and general expenses are not reduced by them, while every department of the business will be affected.

The claim that the nine-hour day is excessive on sanitary grounds is hardly worthy of consideration; the physical condition of our employes is sufficient answer to that.

The decrease in hours and increase in wages since 1898 amount on the average to at least an increase of 33⅓ per cent in wages per hour, and the increased cost of a further reduction to eight hours will result in an additional increased labor cost of from 18 to 25 per cent, depending upon conditions and locality. For it should be remembered that this reduction must be followed either by increasing the size and cost of plant, with attendant increase in rents, etc., or the work must be done on overtime and at overtime prices—elements too often overlooked in the computation.

The building trades, so often cited as on eight hours, form no basis for comparison, as the invested capital per employe is but a small percentage of that in the printing business, and their work must be done on the premises, while much printing can be done anywhere; and such an increase in cost as is contemplated, which must inevitably be borne by the customer, will result in driving no inconsiderable amount of work out of the country. This is no idle dream, it is a cold fact, as stated by reputable publishers in the city of New York.

The increase in cost will inevitably result in a reduction of the total amount of work to be done, for the large purchasers of printing are counting the cost as never before, and competition is not alone between men, but between methods as well, and any considerable increase in cost will change the current which has been for some years so largely in the direction of catalogue work and other printing into other channels.

Comparison is sometimes made between the working hours in newspaper and in book and job offices. I do not need in this assembly to call attention to the difference in conditions. In the newspaper offices the demand is for the greatest possible output in the shortest possible time, and the nervous strain to which a newspaper man is subjected when compared to that of the book and job man is, I believe, even now disproportionate to the difference in working time. Then the work must be done, not only in a specified time, but in a specified place, and is not in any sense a subject of competition.

Gentlemen, if you carry out your program and insist on eight hours or a strike next January, sorry as we shall all be (and we shall be sorry, as we always are at any differences between employers and employes) there is no alternative for us; we must meet you in a fight which will mean much to both of us, but in which WE are fighting with our all at stake, and we MUST fight to win.

This is not a matter of principle, but a practical question of dollars and cents. In our convention, in the many meetings of employing printers throughout the country and during the year in constant interviews and correspondence with the employing printers of the country, I find there is an almost unanimous feeling that it is impossible for them to increase the price of their product to their customers; and under these circumstances it means, should they accept the eight-hour day, certain ruin.

By your demand you are presenting to the employing printers of the country the two horns of a dilemma: Either to accept the eight-hour day and face certain ruin, or to fight your demand to the very limit of their resources. I recognize that both your officers and many of your rank and file honestly differ with the belief of the employing printers that the eight-hour day would bring to them ruin. Yet you must accept their honesty of mind in believing the contrary and give due weight to their experience in the conduct of their business.

The situation then narrows itself down to the following: If you insist upon the eight-hour day the printers of America must fight you. We have no idea that in every place we will be successful, but we are confident that in the majority of cases we will win and that the present relationship between your union and the United Typothetæ of America will be broken up—a relationship which has been to the benefit of both parties—and that, from now on, throughout this country most of the large book and job offices will operate in disregard of your organization, if not in hostile opposition to it.

The insistence on the eight-hour day on January 1, 1906, will result in a disastrous warfare; and the object of my presence here today is to assure you, gentlemen, in spite of the many reports to the contrary, that the employing printers of the United States are sincere in their opposition to this movement and will resist it to the last ditch.

One thing more: It has been stated that if there is a strike, we, the employers, will be held responsible. We deny this responsibility. Employing printers, as a class, were never more anxious for co-operation with their employes than now. Never did they realize more fully that their interests are largely identical, that prosperity for one means prosperity for both—look back over the past few years and see how fairly your demands have been met—but when their business sense and experience tell them that you are asking what can not be granted they must refuse at any cost.

I sincerely hope that your more mature judgment will rescind a resolution, which if acceded to by your employers will mean ruin to many of them and no financial advantage to yourselves.

William Green, chairman of the executive committee of the United Typothetæ of America, said he had nothing to add to President Ellis' address, he assuming the position of the fifth wheel.

The gentlemen then retired amid great applause.

Telegrams of felicitation were received and read from the stereotypers and electrotypers, and from Minneapolis Union No. 42.

President Lynch then announced the following changes in committees caused by the non-attendance of delegates:

Committee on credentials—Estey (Paterson, N. J.) instead of Eagledon (Windsor).

Committee on TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL—Anderson (Macon) instead of Lavery (Poughkeepsie).

Committee on arbitration—Parsell (Kansas City).

Committee on organization—Baker (Fresno) instead of Maulsby (Tacoma).

Committee on allied trades—Harris (Washington, Ind.) instead of Buchanan (New York Newswriters).

Committee on press—Sutch (East Liverpool) instead of Doyle (Boston Newswriters).

Committee on label—Hollingsworth (Jacksonville), instead of Conklin (Charleston, S. C.).

Committee on report of federation delegates—Casey (Erie) instead of Bender (Roanoke).

Committee on miscellaneous business—Edwards (Clinton) instead of Grier (Wilmington).

Committee on copyright—Colburn (Superior) instead of Pierce (Muncie).

A motion was made and carried that all resolutions and similar documents be prepared and presented in duplicate.

It was moved, and the motion prevailed, that 12 noon, on Wednesday, be set as the time limit for the introduction of resolutions, etc.

After a spirited debate, a motion prevailed to prohibit smoking during the sessions.

The report of the committee on laws was then taken up.

Proposition No. 65, by Delegate Smith (Philadelphia), relating to the extension of floor privileges, was considered by the committee, and a substitute reported that no persons other than duly elected delegates and officers shall be accorded the floor except by unanimous consent, provision being made for the hearing of representatives of the typothetæ or the newspaper publishers in case they desire to be heard. The substitute recommended by the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 2, by Delegate Kennedy (Minneapolis), to amend section 1, article 1 of the constitution, to include proofreaders who have served four years as copyholders, was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 3, by Delegate Kipp (Columbus Newswriters), to amend section 1, article 1 of the constitution, by striking out the words "of North America," was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 4, by Delegate Kipp (Columbus Newswriters), to amend section 4, article 1 of the constitution, so as to give to each subordinate branch its distinctive name, was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Welcome to Visiting Printers

The following poem of welcome was written by William H. Taylor, a member of The World chapel of No. 91, International Typographical Union, for the souvenir of the visit of the "typos" to Toronto:

YE sons of Franklin! Welcome to the North!
Toronto's brother craftsmen now give forth
A thousand hearty welcomes to the men
Behind the Press, which is Jehovah's pen,
That writes upon the wall the tyrant's fate,
And drafts the bill that "Labor is the State."
We twine our flags today, we know no line,
The International our lives combine;
Our hands clasp yours, our bounding hearts respond
To yours in Kinship's blood-red mystic bond.

When man rode forth on evolution's car,
The night was black, and pale his natal star;
But somewhere in his soul was hid the fire,
Which lit a feeble lamp to lead him higher;
At first he carved rude symbols on a bone,
Or pictured prehistoric scenes on stone;
Until immortal thought and human speech
On lettered pages gave the power to teach
Experience, reason, and the strength to soar
Beyond our sphere, and knock at God's own door.

We pass Assyria, Egypt, Greece and Rome,
Where intellectual giants built a home;
But all their labors only helped to fence
The king's, the priest's and soldier's consequence;
The common herd, the people, bore the brand
Of deep-seared ignorance on brow and hand;
But Gutenberg's great light dissolved hell's gloom
That caste had spread on earth for labor's doom.
Rejoice! Bold Typos! Nobly play your parts,
Defend "The Art Preservative of Arts."

We lead the van in war for Liberty,
And guard the precious boon Equality,
So let us not forget Fraternity;
For Universal Brotherhood we strive,
And keep the grace of Charity alive.
Another era dawns upon the world,
The rings and money kings will soon be hurled
From self-elected thrones—their mills shall cease
To grind up flesh and blood for chariot grease.
May capital and labor join and say:
"A fair day's labor for a fair day's pay;"
So said the MAN whose Word our laws inspire:
"The laborer is worthy of his hire."

Come, craftsmen, from west, the south and east,
Fair Canada entreats that you will feast
'Neath sunny skies in nature's granary
On "corn, and wine, and oil," in harmony.
The honor is our own—Toronto's yours—
You hold the keys to this Queen City's stores
Of beauty and delight. Again we greet
Columbia's sons. Our royal welcome meet.

Proposition No. 5, by Delegate Dirks (St. Louis), to so amend the constitution as to exclude the president from participating in the sessions of the executive council when it was considering cases appealed from his decision, was reported unfavorably, and at the request of Delegate Dirks the proposition was withdrawn.

Proposition No. 6, by Delegate Kennedy (Minneapolis), to make the salaries of the president and secretary-treasurer $2,500 per annum, was reported favorably, with the figures changed to $2,100. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 7, by Delegate Kipp (Columbus Newswriters), to amend the constitution so as to provide a salary of $50 per year for the representative from the newswriters as fourth vice-president, was reported unfavorably. Delegate Kipp asked permission to withdraw the proposition, which was granted.

Proposition No. 8, by Delegate Dirks (St. Louis), contemplating an explanatory addition to article xvii, section 3 of the constitution, relating to the referendum, was reported unfavorably. Delegate Dirks asked permission to withdraw the proposition, and the request was granted.

Proposition No. 9, by Delegate Dirks (St. Louis), Proposition No. 10, by Delegate Kennedy (Minneapolis), and Proposition No. 11, by Delegate Lovett (Charleston, W. Va.), all relating to the establishment of a system of sick benefits or insurance, were considered collectively by the committee, and reported unfavorably. After some discussion the propositions were divided, and the report of the committee on Proposition No. 9 was non-concurred in. Proposition No. 10 was withdrawn, and the unfavorable report of the committee on Proposition No. 11 was concurred in. Proposition No. 9 requires that the president shall appoint a committee of three to investigate and report to the next convention a plan for the inauguration of a system of pensions and relief for aged and sick members. The proposition was adopted.

Delegate Fennessy (Los Angeles) moved the appointment of a committee of three to arrange for an armistice between the representatives of Colorado Springs and Pittsburg in relation to the place for holding the next convention. The motion prevailed and the president appointed Delegates Snyder (Colorado Springs), Klein (Pittsburg), and Fennessy (Los Angeles), chairman.

Consideration of the report of the committee on laws was resumed.

Proposition No. 12, by Delegate Sullivan (Nashville), relating to that part of the laws covering reports to the International secretary-treasurer, was reported unfavorably. Delegate Sullivan asked and received consent to withdraw the proposition.

Proposition No. 13, by Delegate Moore (Shreveport), to amend section 32 of the general laws by making the initiation fee from applicants in unorganized towns $5 instead of $2, was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Propositions No. 14, by Delegate Moore (Shreveport), No. 15, by Delegate Sullivan (Lafayette), and No. 16, by Delegate Dawson (New Kensington), were considered collectively. They referred to the jurisdiction of unions over working proprietors. The committee reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 17, by Delegate Woody (Richmond, Va.), providing that machine operators may under certain conditions accept a bonus for setting more than a prescribed amount of type, was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 18, by Delegate Buehler (Milwaukee), regarding the loaning of the allied label, was reported unfavorably. Delegate Buehler asked and received unanimous consent for the withdrawal of the proposition.

Proposition No. 19, by Delegate Seaman (Cincinnati), exempting subs from the six-day law, was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 20, by Delegate Knapp (Washington, D. C.), along the same lines as Proposition No. 19, was reported unfavorably. The proposition was withdrawn by consent.

Proposition No. 21, by Delegate Bandlow (Cleveland German-American), to prohibit German composition being done in English offices at a lesser rate or at longer hours than prevail in offices under the jurisdiction of the Typographia, was reported unfavorably. The committee asked that the proposition be recommitted, and the request was granted.

Proposition No. 22, by Delegate Bandlow (Cleveland German-American), seeking to add a preamble to the constitution, was reported unfavorably, and while the report was being discussed the hour of adjournment arrived and the matter was laid over till the next session.

President Lynch announced that Frederick Driscoll, of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, and President Higgins, of the International Pressmen and Assistants' Union, would address the convention on Wednesday morning.

The convention adjourned until Wednesday at 9 A. M.

THIRD DAY.

MORNING SESSION.

President Lynch called the convention to order at 9:15 o'clock.

After roll call a greeting was read from the Toronto Bookbinders' Union, and also a communication from the Woman's International Auxiliary, requesting that the delegates smoke whenever and wherever they please. The Allied Printing Trades Council of Toronto also extended fraternal greetings.

The receipt of three additional credentials was reported by Secretary-Treasurer Bramwood.

Consideration of the report of the laws committee was resumed.

Proposition No. 22 (in relation to the preamble to the constitution) being under discussion, Delegate Hayes (Cleveland) offered as a substitute that the convention reaffirm the first resolution now included in our book of laws (1905). The substitute was adopted.

The laws committee asked for reconsideration of Proposition No. 4 (by Delegate Kipp of Columbus Newswriters, relating to the distinctive names of the various subordinate branches), and offered the following substitute:

Amend section 4, article i of the constitution, so as to read as follows:

"Section 4. The distinctive names of the several subordinate branches shall be: Of the printers, Typographical Union; of the mailers, Mailers' Union; of the writers, Newspaper Writers' Union; of the typefounders, Typefounders' Union, and of other allied crafts or trades, if such there be, the distinctive name of each branch."

The substitute of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 23, by Delegate Croft (Boston), to amend section 94 of the general laws by omitting the words "within sixty days," was reported favorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 24, by Delegate Cahill (St. Paul), to prevent foremen from importing help when competent members of a local were obtainable, was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 25, by Delegate Nock (Birmingham), to make section 96 of the general laws more specific by eliminating the word "practice," was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 26, by Delegate Barnes (Chattanooga), providing that local unions shall establish a degree of competency for machine operators, was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Commissioner Driscoll of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association was then introduced, and delivered a short address. The commissioner congratulated the two bodies on their pleasant and profitable relations during the past year, commended President Lynch on the stand he had taken in regard to the syndicate supplements, and expressed the wish that the pleasant relations now existing between the union and the newspaper publishers would continue.

On motion of Delegate Green (Atlanta) speeches were limited to two minutes.

The convention resumed consideration of the report of the committee on laws.

Proposition No. 27, by Delegate Barnes (Chattanooga), compelling foremen to conform to the hours set by the local, was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 28, by Delegate Barnes (Chattanooga), to amend the general laws so as to prevent foremen from filling the place of a regular machine operator, was withdrawn by the author.

Proposition No. 29, by Delegate Nock (Birmingham), to make section 100 of the general laws more specific by eliminating the words "the practice of," was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 30, by Delegate Nock (Birmingham), to amend section 136 of the general laws by eliminating the words "the practice of," was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 31, by Delegate Kennedy (Minneapolis), amending section 136, general laws, was reported unfavorably, and withdrawn.

Proposition No. 32, by Delegate Kennedy (Minneapolis), along the same lines as the preceding one, was reported unfavorably, and withdrawn.

Proposition No. 33, by Delegate West (Brockton), specifying the time apprentices shall be employed at the various branches of the business, was reported unfavorably. After some discussion the proposition was referred back to the committee.

Proposition No. 34, by Delegate Croft (Brockton), relating to "jumping" machines, was reported unfavorably, and was withdrawn by the author.

Proposition No. 35, by Delegate West (Brockton), seeking to exclude machinists who are not practical printers from having any control over operators, was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Delegate Hayes (Cleveland) moved that the report of the eight-hour committee be printed and distributed to the delegates. The motion prevailed.

The committee on appeals announced it was ready to report, and a motion prevailed that the report be printed and distributed, and taken up immediately after roll call on Thursday. On motion, the report was read by Chairman Draper, of the committee.

President Lynch announced that according to law nominations for the next convention city were in order, and Delegates Klein (Pittsburg) and Snyder (Colorado Springs) placed their respective cities in nomination.

After a number of seconding speeches in each instance, the convention adjourned till Thursday at 9 A. M.

FOURTH DAY.

MORNING SESSION.

President Lynch called the convention to order at 9:15 o'clock.

After roll call several telegrams of greeting were read, and the president announced that the report of the committee on appeals in the Smith case was in order.

It was moved, and the motion prevailed, that the report of the committee on appeals in this case be not read (it having been read on the previous day), as the printed report was on the desks of the delegates.

The report of the committee on appeals in the Smith case consisted of a review of the case from the beginning and all evidence submitted. (It appears in full elsewhere in this issue.)

The conclusions and findings of the committee are here given:

In the minds of your committee, this is one of the most important questions that has ever been brought before an International convention. The laws of the International Typographical Union prescribe the duties of the executive council. Among these duties is the disposition of the defense fund. Certain rules are laid down, as to its disposition, by the laws of the organization, while its administration is placed in the hands of the executive council. The council, in exercising its rights and prerogatives under the law, as construed by the council, decided upon a certain course of action in the Philadelphia case. Its adherence to that plan is claimed by Mr. Smith and the trial board of the Philadelphia Union,—and in fact, by the union itself, through its adoption of the report of the trial board,—to have been sufficient ground for the charge of being "in league with the rat employers and rat printers of Philadelphia against Typographical Union No. 2," of "rendering aid and succor to the rats in their fight against the union," and other statements of like character. We submit that this is an unjustifiable assumption on the part of any member or local union connected with this organization. If the unionism of the officers of the International Union, charged with the performance of certain duties, is to be thus grossly attacked and besmirched because official action may not meet with the approval of certain members or officers of a local union, or the local union itself, and the provisions of existing law are not strong enough to cope with such cases, it is high time that a law was enacted that will end, for all time, such flagrant procedure by those who wish to remain enrolled under the banner of the International Typographical Union. But your committee believes that section 81, properly enforced, is ample to cover the case in question. Its provisions are exceedingly plain, and the course of procedure is mandatory. We agree with the members of the executive council that the charges as outlined above, "if founded on fact, mean that the officers of the International Typographical Union constituting the executive council are not worthy to fill the positions they occupy; if not founded on fact, or if malicious or untrue, the provisions of section 81 apply." And those provisions set forth in a mandatory manner the punishment that shall be administered to one violating its provisions. In the case at issue not one scintilla of evidence—direct, documentary or oral—was produced before your committee tending to substantiate the charges made by Shelby Smith. The only defense put in by Mr. Smith is the one which he made before the trial board of Philadelphia Union, which we submit is not evidence at all. On the other side, the appellants (the members of the executive council in the case) defy the production of any such testimony, and they emphatically state, collectively and individually, that no such testimony existed. Your committee, therefore, believes that it is warranted by the facts as disclosed by both sides in coming to the decision that section 81 was deliberately violated by Shelby Smith, and that the trial board of Philadelphia Typographical Union purposely evaded the provisions of section 81 in handling this case, and rendered a verdict that had no evidence to sustain it. We therefore recommend as follows:

1. That Shelby Smith, who is now seated as delegate from Philadelphia Typographical Union, be expelled from the convention and his seat be declared vacant.

2. That Philadelphia Typographical Union be instructed by this convention to immediately expel Shelby Smith from membership in that organization, and it is the verdict of this convention that such expulsion shall remain in effect until such time as Shelby Smith shall make a full and ample public apology to the members of the executive council of the International Typographical Union, such apology to be published in THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL and Trade Union News of Philadelphia, and given such other publicity as may be deemed necessary. By the term "full and ample apology," we mean one that will be acceptable to the members of the executive council, whose personal and official characters have been thus wantonly assailed. If No. 2 fails to enforce this verdict within thirty days its charter to be revoked by the executive council.

In concluding its report, your committee desires to say that the problem before it was not one of sentiment, but one of rendering justice under our laws and according to the facts. A question of the character covered in this report—involving the integrity of its chosen representatives—should not be passed lightly by. It is necessary for the International Typographical Union to take its place among the labor organizations which protect their officers and members from gross and malicious attacks of this nature. We further believe that a concurrence in the recommendations of this committee will show conclusively that the laws of the International Union are enacted for the guidance of its members and officers, and will be enforced without fear or favor.

After some discussion as to placing a time limit on discussion of the case, the two-minute rule was suspended and Delegate Smith (Philadelphia) took the floor and made a statement in his own behalf.

Delegate White (San Francisco) moved to substitute a vote of censure of Smith in place of the findings of the committee.

After some debate on the substitute, the vice-president announced that the time had arrived for taking the ballot on the next convention city.

The result of the vote was: Colorado Springs, 144; Pittsburg, 107; and Colorado Springs was declared selected as the next convention city.

The convention then resumed the report of the committee on appeals.

After a lengthy debate the convention adjourned until 2 o'clock.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Vice-President Hayes called the convention to order at 2:10.

After roll call the report of the committee on appeals was taken up.

Delegate Smith (Philadelphia) made a personal explanation and asked permission to read the following written statement:

I confess that I am not able to produce evidence to substantiate the statements made in the Trades Union News of February 9, concerning the executive council of the International Typographical Union in the construction placed upon them by the council and the committee on appeals—a construction never intended to be conveyed. I deeply regret their publication, and shall request the publication of this statement in the Trades Union News regardless of the action of this convention.

The previous question being called for, the substitute providing for a censure was placed before the convention and was lost by a vote of 163 to 30. The vote on the adoption of the report of the committee on appeals was then taken, and resulted in 209 ayes and 34 nays.

The roll call showed the following vote:

AYES.

Hugo Miller, a member of the executive council, was excused from voting.

The chair declared the report of the committee adopted and the provisions in effect.

Delegate Smith (Philadelphia) then vacated his seat and left the hall.

The report of the eight-hour committee was then read. The report of the committee was later ordered printed and distributed to the membership at large, and is reproduced elsewhere in this issue. It is sufficient to say here that the eight-hour demand of the International Typographical Union is reiterated and made as emphatic as possible.

The president then introduced Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, who addressed the convention at length. The address of Mr. Gompers will in all probability be printed in THE JOURNAL in the near future. It was a masterly exposition of the eight-hour day movement and aroused the delegates to the highest pitch of enthusiasm.

The convention then adjourned until 9 o'clock Friday morning.

FIFTH DAY.

MORNING SESSION.

The vice-president called the convention to order at 9:10 o'clock.

After roll call President Lynch announced that the report of the eight-hour day committee would be taken up.

Delegate Cahill (St. Paul) moved that the report of the eight-hour day committee be adopted and that it be printed and distributed to the membership at large.

Delegate Hayes (Cleveland) reviewed the history of the eight-hour movement in an address and discussed the speech of President Ellis before the convention.

Digitized by Google

Delegate Donnell (Cincinnati) moved the address of Delegate Hayes be made a part of the record for distribution to the membership with the eight-hour report. The motion was adopted.

The address of Mr. Hayes is given herewith:

While the delegates are undoubtedly anxious to finish the work of this convention, considerable of which remains to be transacted, yet I believe that we should give further consideration to some facts that of necessity could not be incorporated in the committee's report, especially as the address of President Ellis, of the United Typothetæ of America, has been made a part of the record and might influence unthinking and careless members and cause them to become lukewarm toward the progressive movement in which we are enlisted.

The salient features of President Ellis' address, directed against the eight-hour day, were his cries of impraticability, and calamity and general ruination for the printing business if the shorter workday is enforced. His position is that of making assertions without presenting evidence to establish the facts. Not an iota of testimony, not a scrap of data, has been furnished to substantiate the statements made. The employing printers gave expression to similar sentiments when it was proposed to reduce the working hours from ten to nine per day. Yet that reform has been accomplished, and who will charge that it has proven impractical and that devastation and ruin has been spread through the printing trade? Neither is the assumption that production will be restricted based upon sound reasoning, as governmental statistics and our own knowledge of printing affairs demonstrate the fact that production was greatly stimulated when the working time was reduced from ten or more hours to nine hours per day. It is fallacious to assert that the output of printing will be reduced when avenues of employment are opened to two or three thousand idle printers, which is the mission of the International Typographical Union at present. On the contrary, those workers will become larger consumers, and thus benefit the whole of society.

This eight-hour movement is not a new one. J. Thorold Rogers tells us in his celebrated historical work, "Six Centuries of Work and Wages," that the eight-hour day prevailed in the last part of the fifteenth and the early part of the sixteenth centuries. That period is described as the golden age, and so prosperous had the people become that the privileged classes, fearful that their reign would be endangered, adopted coercive measures to keep the workers in subjection. The ruling class gradually lengthened the hours of toil, reduced wages and increased prices, and a long period of exploitation and suffering, darkness and chaos was the result.

It was not until 1824 that the anti-combination laws were repealed, after Robert Owens, the pioneer co-operator collectivist, had made a proposition to the British government to organize the industries of the country upon a basis that would require the labor of the men, women and children not longer than eight hours per day to provide for the well-being of all. Gradually the working time was reduced in succeeding years from sixteen to fourteen and twelve, and finally to ten per day. In 1888 the gas workers and general laborers, unskilled men, by the way, at one swoop cut the hours of toil from twelve to eight, and since that year every trade in Great Britain has been benefited by the reduction of the hours of toil.

In Australia, known universally as the eight-hour land, the movement for the shorter workday began in 1856. Although defeated in several disastrous strikes, the trade unions persevered in their efforts, and, supplemented with their political power, made steady gains. As I pointed out the other day, the Australian workingmen not only strike and boycott in shops, factories and mills when necessary, but they have seceded from both old political parties and also strike at the ballot box and in the legislative halls, and it is to their everlasting credit that when their labor party obtained possession of the national government, John Christian Watson, a journeyman printer, became premier for a brief time, until both old parties combined and ousted the labor cabinet from office. The laborites are also in control of a number of Australian states, and the printers are among the most conspicuous of the lawmakers.

It is singular, indeed, that the spokesman of the so-called open shop—the National Association of Manufacturers, of which the more or less notorious David M. Parry is at the head, and with which the United Typothetæ appears to be in sympathy—are unable to furnish us with any proofs of the impracticability and unjustness of the eight-hour workday here at home, but depend upon alleged facts imported from Australia, which are now being circulated through their press and which are intended to show that the eight-hour day and the Saturday half-holiday, are proving ruinous to that country. Yet all the governmental statistics, the British Board of Trade reports, as well as the accounts contained in Australian newspapers, demonstrate beyond the shadow of doubt that the claims made by certain American employers regarding industrial conditions in the antipodes are absolutely without foundation. These stories are circulated for a purpose—to discourage the workers of America from following the example of their brethren beyond the seas in combining industrially and politically.

As Mr. Gompers pointed out yesterday, the workers of continental Europe are making steady progress in reducing the working time and securing greater benefits for themselves. Perhaps you noticed in the St. Petersburg dispatches only recently that the printers of Russia were playing a leading part in the great strikes and demanding the eight-hour day. I know for a certainty that the shorter workday movement has also taken root in Japan, South Africa, and even in South America. Do the members of the typothetæ believe that we, the American workingmen—who are sometimes flattered with being more intelligent than the toilers of other countries—are going to lag at the tail-end of the procession? Certainly the printers will refuse to lock arms with the Chinese in walking for the industrial cake.

In our own country—on this North American continent—despite all obstacles, the eight-hour movement has been making steady progress since 1886, in which year the German-American Typographia (in job offices as well as newspapers), the cigarmakers and a number of smaller trades established the eight-hour workday. Subsequently the miners, carpenters, plumbers, bricklayers and other trades quite generally enforced the eight-hour day, so that now fully a million trade unionists, at the most conservative estimate, and including 25,000 printers, can sing the refrain: Eight hours for work, eight hours for sleep, and eight hours for recreation.

Why should we work any longer than bankers or lawyers or office holders or any professionals and politicians? It is true, paradoxical though it may seem, that the eight-hour day would prove beneficial to proprietors of job and book plants as well as employes, as stated in the committee's report. Quite naturally the front offices will close an hour earlier under the new system, which means one hour less figure juggling and business worry and one hour more real life and enjoyment for the employers. We are really doing Messrs. Ellis, Green, and the other members of the typothetæ a great favor, and they ought to appreciate that fact, for, after all, life should not be a mere sordid grab for dollars. There is an ethical side to this question. Man has a social as well as a physical nature, and while he must preserve his animal existence he must not do so at the expense of his social relations. If he becomes a mere drudge, our civilization is endangered, progress halts, retrogression begins, and slavery and chaos naturally follow.

There is one point that I desire to make clear to the more obstinate gentlemen of the typothetæ, and that is that the standard of living determines the form of our civilization. Mechanics and laborers will not work for less than that which furnishes them with subsistence, with necessities and comforts to which they have become accustomed. The prices of food products, clothing, rents, etc., have steadily increased during the past decade and the purchasing power of the dollars that we receive as wages is correspondingly lessened. Hence the claim of Mr. Ellis that wages have advanced 33⅓ per cent is offset by the cold fact that we are also compelled to pay more tribute to the landlord, the beef trust, coal combine and other associations of capital that are squeezing the people to pay dividends on the watered stock; and therefore I deny the correctness of the logic of Mr. Donnelly, who stated in conference in so many words that we were "squeezing" the employers.

It is a truism that men are never paid according to what they earn, but according to the average cost of living. Now, as a simple matter of equity, how can the typothetæ claim that they, the buyers of labor power, are to be the sole judges of the price to be paid? The sellers of coal, meat, oil, sugar, etc., fix their price; why should not those who dispose of their labor power have the same right? They do have that right, but it can only be maintained in a degree in this capitalistic competitive system through organization, because the natural opportunities are being monopolized by a few. Without organization, the so-called liberties of the working people are becoming a delusion, for no moneyless worker stands an equal chance with the millionaire captain of industry.

Another objection that was raised in the conference between the typothetæ representatives and your committee was that the employers of the larger cities are losing ground to their competitors in the smaller places, and one gentleman (Mr. Green, I believe) raised the point that some jobs had been sent from New York to England. I imagine no system will ever be devised that will keep a certain amount of book and job work in the same office forever, or even in the same country. The International Typographical Union is doing all in its power to abolish these alleged disadvantages, and for that reason the hours of labor will be reduced generally—printers in Chicago will be affected no more and no less than those in Podunk or any other place. As for jobs going to England, the hours of labor are being reduced in that country as well as in America and the purchasing power of wages received is almost the same, and it is doubtful whether the English printers turn out as great amount of work in a given time as do the Americans.

In conclusion, I wish to emphasize the fact that the International Typographical Union and other trade unions, in making the reduction of the hours of labor the paramount issue, are striving to realize one of the most far-reaching and noblest missions ever undertaken by any organization. We are endeavoring to open opportunities to all the people; not a few.

The eight-hour day means not less wages, but more wages; it means the absorption of the unemployed army of workers and the increasing demand for labor as well as minimizing of the present fierce, cut-throat competition.

The eight-hour day means the creating of new hopes, desires and aspirations among our class—a nobler manhood and a happier womanhood and childhood. The eight-hour day means that those now employed would be less exhausted after a day's toil; that mental and physical resources would be fostered and developed and life and health prolonged.

The eight-hour day means stronger family ties, pleasant homes, more time for good books, to attend lectures, to cultivate music, art and science, and for the study of all the glories lavished upon mankind by generous Mother Nature.

The eight-hour day means that poverty would be decreased, sweatshops would be wiped out, drunkenness, prostitution, crime and misery would be greatly reduced; it means that wealth would be more equitably distributed, enlightenment disseminated, invention and discovery stimulated, and a greater and grander progress would bless the world than mankind has yet known.

This is the glorious ideal for which the organized workers are struggling, and they deserve the sympathy and support of all true men and women.

After several enthusiastic speeches the question came on the adoption of the report of the eight-hour committee.

The motion was unanimously adopted, amid scenes of unprecedented enthusiasm.

President Higgins, of the Pressmen and Assistants' Union, was then introduced, and assured the International Typographical Union of the moral support of his organization.

President Robert Glockling, of the Bookbinders, followed Mr. Higgins and assured the printers of the moral support of his organization.

The president announced that the mailers wished to be recorded as in favor of the eight-hour movement.

Delegate Hertenstein (St. Louis) moved that all laws in conflict with the adoption of the eight-hour day on January 1, 1906, be repealed. The motion was adopted.

Delegate Smith (Lincoln) introduced a resolution extending greetings to the woman's auxiliary, which was carried.

Telegrams of greeting and good wishes were read from the United Garment Workers of America, the Retail Clerks' Union, and from the management of the Co-Operative Press of New York. The Bakers' Union of Toronto sent a communication calling attention to the fact that they were engaged in a strike.

The report of the committee on the Los Angeles Times contest, then being called for, was taken up.

The report of this committee was highly encouraging and called attention to the splendid progress being made in the fight for fair conditions in the Times office. The committee recommended that the conduct of the fight be endorsed and that the executive council be directed to continue financial assistance.

There being no objection, Arthur Hay, of Los Angeles, was accorded the floor and made an extended statement of the conditions confronting the committee in the Times contest. He outlined the history of the fight and gave an interesting account of the methods being pursued to bring the paper into line. He expressed confidence in the final favorable outcome of the affair.

The report of the committee was unanimously adopted.

The report of the committee on officers' reports was then taken up. The report of this committee dealt with the reports of the various officers of the International and consisted mainly of a general review of the same. The committee recommended that the action taken by the executive council in the St. Louis case be endorsed by this convention, and the council be commended for its prompt action in the premises. The report of the committee concluded as follows:

In conclusion, we desire to congratulate the executive and other officers of the International Typographical Union on the completeness of the annual reports presented, and to urge upon the delegates and the membership at large careful consideration of the facts and figures set forth in these reports.

Delegate Hertenstein (St. Louis) desired to place St. Louis on record and moved that the report of the committee be concurred in. The motion was unanimously adopted.

The report of the committee on returns and finances was then taken up. The report reviewed the financial report recently published by the International secretary-treasurer, and complimented him on the thoroughness and accuracy displayed. The report of the committee concluded as follows:

This report has been examined by your committee, and found to be correct. Your committee desires to state that the books of the secretary-treasurer are in excellent condition. They have been audited to July 31, 1905, by expert accountants, who not only certify to their correctness, but commend the secretary-treasurer upon the state of his accounts. Your committee desires to add its commendation, testify to the business methods prevailing in the office of the secretary-treasurer, and congratulate the International Union on the manner in which its financial affairs are conducted.

This part of the report was concurred in, and a proposition, which had been referred to the committee, was taken up. This proposition (No. 97, by Jacksonville (Fla.) Union) contemplated removing headquarters to Colorado Springs and the establishment of a printing office there for International work. The committee reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 102, by Delegate Sterling (Boston), relating to the submission to the referendum of a pension plan, was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

The committee recommended allowances to reimburse the assistant secretary, the reading clerk, the messengers and the sergeant-at-arms for their services. It was also recommended that the members of the conference committee with the telegraphers be allowed compensation. The recommendation of the committee was concurred in.

By unanimous consent Delegate Rhoades (Boston) introduced a resolution acknowledging the gratitude of the International Typographical Union to W. R. Hearst for his assistance in the fight on the Los Angeles Times. The resolution was adopted.

The report of the committee on copyright law was taken up and concurred in. The committee reported many profitable conferences on the subject during the past year, and expressed hope of desired legislation in the near future.

The convention then adjourned to meet at 2 P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Vice-President Hayes called the convention to order at 2:10 o'clock.

Unanimous consent was given Delegate Esty (Paterson) for the introduction of a resolution calling upon William R. Hearst to establish a paper in Philadelphia. The resolution was referred to the committee on resolutions.

Consideration of the report of the laws committee was resumed.

As a substitute for Proposition No. 33, by Delegate West (Brockton), the committee reported a new section to go under the head of "Apprentices," which stipulates that an apprentice in a machine office shall be given his last two years on the case and at all the intricate handiwork of the craft, except the last three months, which he may devote to the machine. The report of the committee was adopted.

Delegate West (Brockton) received permission to withdraw Proposition No. 36, establishing a line of competency for machine operators.

Proposition No. 37, by Delegate Lovett (Charleston, W. Va.), to make THE JOURNAL of a technical nature, was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 38, by Delegate Johnston (Houston), concerning the use of the label in towns where no local exists, was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 39, by Clinton (Iowa) Union, to increase the per capita tax so as to pay the expenses of delegates from unions having a membership of less than fifty, was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 40, by Delegate Martin (Denver), providing that members over fifty years of age may work below the scale in certain instances, was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 41, by Delegate Martin (Denver), looking to the admission of all non-unionists and apprentices, on certain conditions, was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

The committee on laws was granted further time on Proposition No. 42.

Proposition No. 43, by Delegate Harris (Washington, Ind.), to increase the burial benefit to $150, was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 44, by Delegate Needham (Des Moines), calling to the attention of the executive the importance of giving smaller unions an equitable representation on committees, was reported favorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Samuel L. Landers, Canadian organizer for the United Garment Workers of America, was introduced and addressed the convention. He urged support for the label of his organization.

The report of the committee on Union Printers' Home was taken up.

The committee recommended that the policy of the board of trustees in excluding applicants suffering from locomotor ataxia or any disease of a loathsome or progressive character, be approved. The recommendation of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 123, by Delegate Steele (Washington, D. C.), required that a part of the proposed Cummings memorial addition be set aside for the accommodation of female members. The committee recommended that the resolution be referred to the Home trustees, with the request that it be given careful consideration. The recommendation of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 104, by Delegates Kennedy and Mulvihill (Minneapolis), an appeal from the decision of the Home trustees in the case of William Myrick of Minneapolis. The committee recommended, in view of conflicting medical opinions, that the board of trustees approve the petition of Mr. Myrick under certain conditions. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 124, by Delegate Brady (Norfolk), providing that each vacating inmate of the Home be given $25, was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Consideration of the report of the laws committee was resumed.

Proposition No. 21, by Delegate Bandlow (Cleveland German-American), provided that the following be added to section 87 of the general laws:

Nor shall German composition in English offices be done at a lesser rate or longer hours than in vogue in offices under jurisdiction of the Typographia.

The committee recommends the following as a substitute:

Section 87. Work in foreign languages shall be at the scale rates of the particular union having jurisdiction. Provided, that in no case shall English composition be at a lesser rate than that of the typographical union. Nor shall foreign composition in English offices be done at a lesser rate or longer hours than is in vogue in offices under jurisdiction of such foreign language union.

The report of the committee was adopted.

The report of the committee on label on text books was taken up. The committee referred to the report of the text book committee contained in the officers' reports, made a few recommendations as to methods to secure the use of the label on that class of work, and recommended that the secretary-treasurer endeavor to have the 12 and 18-point labels made of steel hereafter and cut deep.

Secretary Bramwood expressed a willingness to follow the recommendation as to steel labels, but declared it was impracticable.

The report of the committee was adopted.

The report of the committee on subordinate unions was taken up and the following propositions reported:

Proposition No. 100, by Delegate Klaus (St. Paul), seeking to establish uniformity in the dates of expiration of job scales, was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 103, by Delegate Sterling (Boston), along the same lines as the preceding one, was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 121, by Delegate Nelis (Chicago), looking to the abolishment of schools for the teaching of non-unionists on machines, was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

The report of the committee on label was taken up, and the following propositions were reported:

Proposition No. 46, by Delegate West (Brockton), urging that theatrical, seashore, mountain and pleasure resort printing bear the label, was reported unfavorably, and a substitute offered that urged a systematic label campaign. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 47, by Delegate West (Brockton), in regard to demanding the boot and shoe workers' label, was reported unfavorably, and the committee offered a substitute urging that preference be given union-made goods of all kinds. The report of the committee was adopted.

The label committee presented a resolution urging the establishment of libraries in the jurisdiction of locals. The resolution of the committee was concurred in.

The committee on delegates to the American Federation of Labor commended the action taken at the last federation convention and submitted a resolution tendering the thanks of the International Typographical Union to that body for its support of our eight-hour movement.

The committee on miscellaneous business reported the following propositions:

Proposition No. 91, by Delegate Sherman (Denver), looking to the proper training of apprentices, was reported favorably. The report of the committee was concurred in.

Proposition No. 129, by Delegates Sullivan and Jordan (Nashville), providing that a representative of the International Typographical Union attend the next general conference of the Southern Methodist Episcopal Church, in an endeavor to unionize the publishing plant of that church located at Nashville, was recommended favorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 130, by Delegate Burlington (St. Joseph), seeking to create more efficient workmanship among the members of the International Typographical Union by the establishment of technical libraries, etc., was reported favorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 132, by Delegate Tolan (New York), along the same lines as the preceding one, was reported unfavorably, as it was covered in spirit by the preceding proposition. The report of the committee was adopted.

The committee on organization reported the following propositions:

Proposition No. 90, by Delegate O'Connor (Louisville), asking that organization work be continued in Louisville, was reported favorably. The report of the committee was concurred in.

Proposition No. 99, by the St. Louis delegation, directing attention to the unfairness of the Inland Type Foundry, was recommended favorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 122, by Delegate Bandlow (Cleveland), referring to the Philadelphia Inquirer, was referred to the executive council.

The committee on organization commended the efforts of the organizers, and urged that the work be kept up in the same way as in the past. The report of the committee was adopted.

The report of the committee on allied trade relations took up the report of the International president on that subject, quoted several portions and recommended that they be approved. The following propositions were reported by the committee:

Proposition No. 94, by Delegate Damer (Mobile), making optional the formation of allied councils where but two or three branches were in existence, was reported unfavorably. Delegate Damer was granted permission to withdraw the proposition.

Proposition No. 120, by Delegate Donnell (Cincinnati), stipulating that the agreement with other Internationals be abrogated, was reported unfavorably. After some discussion the report of the committee was concurred in.

The report of the committee to consider relations between the International Typographical Union and the Commercial Telegraphers' Union was taken up. The committee described the hearings that had been had on the subject, recommended that an affiliation with the telegraphers be not entered into, and stated that the telegraphers had withdrawn all propositions looking to a working agreement. The report of the committee was adopted.

The report of the committee on arbitration quoted extracts from the president's report on the subject, and recommended that the convention instruct the executive council to meet with the representatives of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association for the purpose of formulating a new arbitration agreement. The report of the committee was adopted.

The committee on resolutions reported the following propositions:

Proposition No. 49, by Delegate Crosman (Boston), endorsing single tax, was reported without recommendation, and on motion was referred to the federation delegates.

Proposition No. 98, by Delegate Seffing (Cleveland), to place the name of A. T. Proctor, late of Cleveland, on the deceased list, was reported favorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 60, by Delegate Condon (Des Moines), urging foremen to employ, wherever possible, our older members, was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

The convention adjourned until 7:30 in the evening.

EVENING SESSION.

After roll call the report of the committee on resolutions was resumed.

Proposition No. 61, by Delegate Berger (Milwaukee), declaring against militia service until the militia system in vogue in Switzerland, or a similar system, is adopted in the United States, was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

The report of the committee on appeals was then taken up. Proposition No. 64, by the Philadelphia delegates, was read. (See Proposition 64 in review of the first day.) The committee stated that both sides had been given a fair and full hearing, and the committee submitted the following recommendations:

1. That the appeal be dismissed and the previous actions of the executive council be sustained.

2. Resolved, That the fifty-first annual convention of the International Typographical Union, now assembled, emphatically endorse the fight now being waged by Philadelphia Typographical Union No. 2 against the Philadelphia Inquirer.

3. That this convention recommends to the executive council that it appropriate $250 per week for the purpose of thoroughly organizing Philadelphia, the local union to appropriate a like amount per week, not more than $250 per week to be used in the Inquirer contest, until the Inquirer fight is won; the balance to be expended in an effort to unionize the large number of non-union and open book and job offices at present existing in Philadelphia. Said appropriation to continue at the discretion of the executive council, as provided in our laws.

Chairman Draper also gave a brief synopsis of the work of the committee, and read the following stipulation:

TORONTO, August 18, 1905.

Agreement between Executive Council, International Typographical Union, and the Philadelphia delegation.

The Philadelphia delegation agrees to the proposition that the organization work and fight is in charge of the executive council and that Philadelphia Union No. 2 will accept and obey suggestions and orders issued by the council.

JOHN MEADE,
ERNEST KREFT,
W. W. FARIES.

The question being on concurrence in the committee's report, it was adopted by a unanimous rising vote.

Delegate Kreft, for Philadelphia Union, and Secretary-Treasurer Bramwood, for the executive council, congratulated the committee on its fair and impartial report.

The convention then resumed consideration of the report of the committee on resolutions.

Proposition No. 62, by Delegate Berger (Milwaukee), relating to the establishment by the government of old-age pensions for workers, was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 63, by Delegate Berger (Milwaukee), condemning the recently organized "Industrial Workers of the World," was withdrawn by unanimous consent.

date in article iii, section 6, of the by-laws, from June 1 to July 1. The committee brought in a substitute covering the subject. The substitute of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 115, by Delegate Nock (Birmingham), to amend sections 96, 100 and 136 of the general laws by striking out the word "practice" in the first line of each section, was considered by the committee and the following substitute reported: Strike out all of sections 96, 100 and 136, and substitute the following sections in their respective places:

Section 96. The selection by foremen of their forces from day to day, or not having any regular situation in an office, is prohibited. Foremen must give out such minimum number of situations as are needed to meet office requirements. Employment other than a regular situation shall be classed as extra work.

Section 100. Phalanxing by foremen, or giving out six-day situations on seven-day papers, thereby controlling extra work, constitutes a sub list. Any member in an office, seven-day paper or otherwise, is entitled to employ in his stead, whenever so disposed, any competent member of the International Typographical Union, without consultation or approval of the foreman of said office. A fine of $25 shall be imposed upon foremen for violation or evasion of this law. Any chairman failing to report the violation of this section shall be fined $25.

Section 136. The interchanging, exchanging, borrowing, lending or buying of matter previously used, either in the form of type or matrices, between newspapers or job offices, not owned by the same individual, firm or corporation and published in the same establishment, is unlawful, and shall not be allowed: Provided, That the reproduction of such type or matrices shall be deemed a compliance with this law.

The substitute of the committee (which corrects existing law so as to conform with Mr. Nock's amendment) was adopted.

Proposition No. 116, by Delegate McCahill (Columbus), that all local unions furnish apprentices with THE JOURNAL, was so amended by the committee as to recommend such action to local unions. The substitute of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 117, by Delegate Needham (Des Moines), providing for the fixing of the dues of members who are stockholders or proprietors, was reported unfavorably. The proposition was withdrawn by unanimous consent.

Proposition No. 119, by Delegate Reilly (Dallas), providing for the punishment of any member who shall publish articles inimical to the interests of the union, was reported unfavorably. The proposition was withdrawn.

Proposition No. 131, by Delegate Burlington (St. Joseph), providing for the establishment of a fund for loaning money to aid traveling printers, was reported unfavorably. The report of the committee was adopted.

Proposition No. 42, by Delegate Draper (Ottawa), sought to amend the by-laws so as to instruct the secretary-treasurer to pay the assessments of the trades and labor congress of Canada as they fall due.

Committee recommended the following substitute:

Resolved, That the secretary-treasurer be authorized and instructed to pay to the Canadian Trades and Labor Congress a per capita of 1½ cents monthly on all members of the International Typographical Union in good standing in the Dominion of Canada.

The substitute of the committee was adopted.

It was moved by Delegate Donnell (Cincinnati) that Proposition No. 92 (relating to the withholding of suspensions, expulsions, rejections and reinstatements from publication) shall take effect immediately. Adopted.

The report of the laws committee, as amended, was then concurred in.

The consideration of the report of the committee on miscellaneous business was then taken up.

Proposition No. 50, by the Boston delegation, urging the necessity of a government parcels post service, was referred to the executive council for favorable consideration.

The concluding report of the committee on resolutions, directing the executive council, if it be in their judgment for the best interests of the International Typographical Union, to consult with W. R. Hearst as to the advisability of establishing a paper in Philadelphia, was adopted.

The committee on Union Printers' Home reported unfavorably on the appeal of Samuel D. Daniels, and the report of the committee was adopted.

The committee on TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL heartily endorsed the policy of THE JOURNAL and congratulated the membership on its financial success. The attention of the editor was directed to the demand for the establishment of a technical department, and it was suggested that he lay such a plan, if practicable, before the next convention. The report of the committee was unanimously adopted.

Chairman Anderson (Macon) stated, in connection with the report from THE JOURNAL committee, that in the past few days the action of this convention in enforcing its laws had been distorted and construed by certain persons in attendance here as an effort to muzzle the press. The chairman stated that for the benefit of those who might be appealed to by such argument, and in justice to the convention, he wished to say that the convention had taken absolutely no such action and had not attempted to stifle nor muzzle the press, and that no man who spoke or voted on the proposition had any such intention. That the convention had only enforced its laws, which provide against the circulation of malicious, false or scurrilous literature or statements; that a labor editor or any other editor was entitled to criticize this organization, its officers or members, the convention only demanding that when charges are made they shall be founded on fact, and language held within the bounds of decency. This is demanded by the laws of the land, and is all that the action of the convention implied, or intended to imply.

The supplemental report of the Cummings memorial committee showed progress in the work of collecting funds and urged a continuance of the work, that the building might be dedicated, or at least the cornerstone laid, at the next convention at Colorado Springs. The report of the committee was adopted.

The committee on laws offered an additional resolution authorizing the executive council to seek a conference with the representatives of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association with a view to reaching an agreement in regard to the supplement question that would be agreeable to all parties. The report of the committee was adopted.

The committee on thanks extended thanks to the entertainment committee of Toronto Union for their magnificent program and entertainment; to the many speakers who addressed the convention; to Hamilton Union for the courtesies extended; to the press of the city of Toronto; to the various committees and officers. The report was unanimously adopted.

The committee on laws thanked the convention for the support given its report.

Delegate Fennessy (Los Angeles) said he could not go home satisfied unless there was a grand warwhoop for the eight-hour day. He offered for favorable unanimous consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the official battle cry of the International Typographical Union in the agitation for the eight-hour day be:

"We propose to sell to the employer eight hours out of twenty-four, and we will do as we please with the remaining sixteen."

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

The committee on thanks then brought in a supplemental report. The local committee on entertainment was called before the desk and presented with mementoes by President Lynch. The president made a few remarks on the excellent entertainment. He presented Chairman Stevenson with a silver service, Secretary Chinn with an elegant gold watch, Vice-Chairman Armstrong with a gold-headed cane, Treasurer How with a silk umbrella, Assistant Secretary Vodden with a silk umbrella, and the balance of the members of the committee with handsome seal rings. The convention also presented the Toronto Union with a beautiful Canadian flag.

After a few speeches. Delegate Fennessy (Los Angeles) asked the convention to give three cheers and a tiger for the eight-hour day and for the International Typographical Union, which were heartily given.

Three cheers were also given for President Lynch, the executive council and Secretary-Treasurer Bramwood.

There being no further business, the convention was declared adjourned sine die.

UP to the time THE JOURNAL goes to press we haven't noticed that any one prominent in the trade union movement has subscribed to Fads and Fancies.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON EIGHT-HOUR DAY.

TORONTO, ONT., August 17, 1905.

To the Officers and Delegates of the Fifty-first Session of the International Typographical Union:

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN—Your committee on the eight-hour day begs leave to submit the following report:

In the first instance the committee is of the opinion that, owing to the near approach of the date upon which it has been determined by our referendum that the eight-hour day shall be inaugurated, a review of the history of the eight-hour movement is desirable, in order that the delegates to this convention may thoroughly understand the steps that have been taken, and that they be familiar with all phases of the subject. The committee has been to some labor to prepare this data, and it is of the opinion that the report it herewith submits will be of value, not only to this convention, but to the membership at large.

At the forty-eighth session of the International Typographical Union, held in Cincinnati, August 11-17, 1902, the following was adopted:

That the executive council of the International Typographical Union and the first vice-president are directed to act as a committee for the purpose of devising and putting into effect plans for the establishment of an eight-hour day throughout the jurisdiction of the International Typographical Union at as early a date as practicable.

That local unions be required to act in conjunction with the said committee in furthering its plans, and that they be enjoined from making contracts extending beyond October 1, 1905, which require their members to work more than eight hours per day.

That the said committtee bring the matter befor the National Typothetæ, to the end that the eight-hour day may be put into operation without friction.

That should the committee deem it necessary to add to its numbers, it shall be empowered to do so.

The report of the president to the Cincinnati session, treating of the eight-hour day in book and job rooms, said:

Various methods have been suggested whereby the eight-hour day can be generally put into effect in book and job rooms, and all of these have merit. One of these suggestions which particularly appeals to our members as feasible, and also just to the employers, is that the working time shall be reduced fifteen minutes each year for four years, or until the eight-hour day is an accomplished fact. * * * That the eight-hour day will eventually be established as the maximum for our entire membership goes without challenge. We trust that it may come peaceably, but in any event, come it must.

The Cincinnati convention also directed that "Local unions, in forming new scales, make an effort to secure the eight-hour day."

In circular No. 1, the International eight-hour committee made the following recommendations:

1. That in the making of new scales or contracts local unions endeavor to incorporate the suggestion contained in the president's annual report and made a part of this circular—that the working time in book and job rooms be reduced fifteen minutes each year for four years. This suggestion to apply in case agreements, embracing better terms, can not be negotiated.

2. That an eight-hour committee of not less than five members shall be appointed at once.

3. Every movement, to be successful, must be properly financed. It is recommended, therefo that local unions and eight-hour committees g consideration to the establishment of an eight-h fund. If needed, it is vital that the money sh be on hand.

Circular No. 2 again made reference to the quest that local eight-hour committees should appointed, and asked for the names of memb making up these committees. It was again poin out that Every movement, to be successful, must be pr erly financed. It is recommended, therefore, t local unions and eight-hour committees give c sideration to the establishment of an eight-h fund. If needed, it is vital that the money sh be on hand."

The instructions enacted by the Cincinnati c vention were printed in black type at the beginni of circular No. 2:

That the local unions be required to act in c junction with the said committee in furthering plans, and that they be enjoined from making c tracts extending beyond October 1, 1905, wh require their members to work more than ei hours per day.

Circular No. 3 informed the membership t since the eight-hour-day agitation was launch many locals have provided in contracts for gradual shortening of the hours, and the inaugu tion of the eight-hour day on October 1, 1905. C tinuing, this circular said:

In the making of new contracts in your juris tion, effort should be put forth to secure the eig hour day at once, if possible, if not, the grad reduction of the hours or the eight-hour day a specified date not later than October 1, 19 * * * Local eight-hour committees must guided largely by local conditions. In a sense achievement of the shorter workday is a local qu tion. If opportunity presents itself, make most of it. Hold frequent committee meetin and discuss ways and means to achieve the desi end. That which may seem an impossibility no will become a reality through energetic, const and intelligent effort.

Circular No. 4 asked for local data.

Circular No. 5 gave certain statistical inform tion that was gathered as a result of the local d asked for in circular No. 4. The report of eight-hour committee at the Washington conv tion, which was adopted by that gathering, is a made a part of Circular No. 5. The propositi receiving the sanction of the committee was as f lows:

Whereas, Many unions have secured agreeme with employers for the inauguration of an eig hour workday in the book and job offices; the fore, be it

Resolved, That subordinate unions, in enteri into such agreements, are instructed to secure eight-hour workday in preference to the forty-eig hour week, or any plan that permits of the ti gained being deducted from any one day, to end that the spirit of the shorter workday mo ment may be observed, and more work distribut among the book and job men not regularly e ployed.

It was also adopted:

That the committee on eight-hour day be structed to notify local unions which have not ready obtained the eight-hour day or made c tracts binding them to its provisional institut that it is the sense of the International Typogra ical Union that they make effort on January 1905, to obtain the eight-hour day according to plans deemed most expedient by such local unions in their several localities.

Continuing, the committee said:

Your committee congratulates the president and the executive council on the large number of unions that have secured, or partially secured, the eight-hour day during the past year through their efforts, and urges upon all local unions and eight-hour committees to put forth the greatest efforts during the coming year.

From the data furnished the committee we find that a large number of local unions failed to report their status on the eight-hour day after blanks had been sent them requesting such information, and your committee respectfully urges all local unions to take a more active interest and lend greater support to the executive officers.

Your committee recommends and urges all delegates in attendance at this convention, on return to their respective unions, to incorporate in their reports a statement of the progress of the eight-hour day during the past year, and to use their best endeavors to have their local committee "wake up," and those not having such committee to immediately appoint one, for it is only by persistent effort and keeping constantly at it that we can hope to achieve the desired aim.

Circular No. 6 stated that frequently a local committee wrote the International committee that the local union which it represented was situated in a jurisdiction too large or too small for an immediate attempt for the eight-hour day. Attention was drawn to the fact that a large union, San Francisco Typographical Union No. 21, and a small union, Paducah Typographical Union No. 134, had arranged for and enforced the eight-hour day. It was pointed out that

The result achieved by these two unions, and by more than eighty other typographical unions, can be brought about by every typographical union that does not at present enforce the eight-hour day in book and job rooms.

Circular No. 7 gave that portion of the report of President Lynch to the St. Louis convention dealing with the eight-hour campaign and the progress that had been made, together with excerpts from the reports of officers to the convention of the United Typothetæ of America, previously held in the city of St. Louis, Mo.

We quote herewith the following resolutions adopted by the United Typothetæ at its St. Louis convention, together with the letter of transmission to our representatives:

St. Louis, June 23, 1904.

Messrs. Lynch, Bramwood and Miller, Committee from International Typographical Union:

Gentlemen—In accordance with your request, expressed in the conference yesterday, that we should obtain from the convention a statement of its attitude upon the proposed eight-hour day, we placed the matter before the convention, and also the telegram addressed to you from Indianapolis, and beg to submit in reply thereto the following resolutions, which passed unanimously.

Whereas, The International Typographical Union has asked the United Typothetæ of America to declare its position upon the proposed eight-hour day; and,

Whereas, Under existing conditions any attempt to reduce the hours of labor in the printing trade would be disastrous to the employer and employe alike; be it

Resolved, That the United Typothetæ of America declares that it is opposed to any reduction of the fifty-four-hour week; and, be it further

Resolved, That the United Typothetæ of America will resist any attempt on the part of the International Typographical Union to reduce the present hours of labor.

Yours very truly,
William Green.
George H. Ellis.
Harry P. Pears.
Thomas E. Donnelly.
F. C. Nunemacher.

It was pointed out in the report of the president that

The recently oft-repeated assertion that the eight-hour day in book and job rooms is a question for adjudication between the International Typographical Union and the United Typothetæ of America was put to the test in St. Louis on June 22 and 23. The annual convention of the typothetæ was held in the Exposition City the week of the 20th. Prior to this gathering, the International president addressed a letter to the typothetæ secretary reciting the action taken by our Cincinnati convention on the eight-hour proposition, and continuing: "It has been frequently intimated by local associations of the typothetæ that the eight-hour day was an issue that should be adjusted between the International Typographical Union and the United Typothetæ of America, and that these local associations were willing to accept and put into effect any conclusion that might be arrived at by the higher bodies. So often, indeed, has this intimation been made, and in several instances accepted by our local unions, that the eight-hour committee for the International Typographical Union is prepared and anxious to demonstrate the effectiveness of the suggestion. Therefore, our eight-hour committee, or a majority of that committee, will be in St. Louis during your eighteenth annual convention, which, I understand, will be held during the week commencing Monday, June 20, 1904, in the convention hall of the Century building, Ninth and Olive streets. Our committee will at that time, or at such time during the week as may be designated by your convention, be pleased to meet a committee representing your association, for the purpose of discussing the eight-hour day, and, if possible, arriving at a conclusion that may be submitted to the United Typothetæ of America and the International Typographical Union for consideration and possible ratification."

In accordance with our request, the typothetæ convention instructed a committee to meet with our International representatives, and conferences were held on June 22 and 23. At the first meeting the employers asked us to make a proposition for the inauguration of the shorter workday, which they would present to their convention. This was declined, our committee requesting that before any discussion as to detail the typothetæ should declare its position on the shorter workday proposition. If this attitude was favorable, we said the two committees could then take up and endeavor to reach an agreement as to the date on which the reduction or partial reduction in hours should take place. On the other hand, if the attitude of the United Typothetæ was unfavorable to a curtailment of the present working time, then we wanted to know that, and in such a way that there would remain no room for misunderstanding. In other words, if the employers should give us a negative reply, we wanted it on the main question, and not on a proposition from us for the inauguration of the shorter workday on a certain date, which might leave local associations free to assert that the United Typothetæ had not declared itself against an eight-hour day, but only against its initiation on the date which our committee had named. This was finally agreed to, and on the 23d we were given a copy of the resolutions adopted by the typothetæ convention, squarely setting forth the position of the United Typothetæ of America on the request made by the International Typographical Union for an agreement under which the eight-hour day would become effective in book and job rooms. It was just the answer we expected, and we were in no wise disappointed. Indeed, we believed that we had reason for congratulating ourselves in that the atmosphere had been thoroughly cleared, and henceforth we would know exactly where we stood. There can be no further shifting of the problem to other shoulders by either local unions or local employers. It is a clean-cut, well-defined, pressing condition.

We continue to quote from the report of the president of the St. Louis convention, as we believe that that report, taken in connection with the resolutions adopted by the St. Louis convention of the United Typothetæ of America makes ridiculous some recent statements by the Typothetæ, and also clearly sets forth the attitude of that association toward our eight-hour day at the time our St. Louis convention met.

Recently I made reference in my JOURNAL notes to "Circular No. 6," issued from the headquarters of the United Typothetæ of America, and which contained this statement: "The efforts of the International Typographical Union to inaugurate a shorter workday have been met by the earnest opposition of the United Typothetæ of America, and every effort possible is being made to advise cities where agitation is carried on to turn a deaf ear to any such suggestion, and, if necessary, fight it." On this the following comment was made: "Some of our members have inclined to the belief that conferences should be sought with the officers of the United Typothetæ of America relative to the eight-hour day, and the above quotation may bring about a change in this regard. The typothetæ intends to oppose the eight-hour day just so long as opposition is feasible. When the employing book and job printers become convinced that we are determined in our efforts to secure the shorter workday, then will it be possible to confer with prospect for success. The agitation for the nine-hour day extended over many years before it crystallized and had result. Success came when the membership was aroused."

Under the caption "Some Additional Evidence," the following was also printed in my department: "In an address delivered at New Haven, January 19th, before the Connecticut State Typothetæ, by the secretary of the United Typothetæ of America, that official is reported to have said: "The length of the workday is not of so much importance as the returns received. We are endeavoring to suppress all agitation started by the International Typographical Union. If the hours are reduced the expenses of the business are added to by fifteen per cent. There is a movement in Congress to frame an eight-hour day, which is a dangerous one. We are opposing it because it is unwise, and we are petitioning our members to have their senators oppose the bill. We are also antagonizing the anti-injunction bill. We stand for the 'open' office, although we agree that the union men are the best workmen that we can secure." Could there be a clearer outline of the attitude of the associated employing printers toward the agitation for a shorter workday? Yet we are told to confer with the United Typothetæ of America! Yes, when we have aroused the union printers of the country, when we have imbued them with eight-hour enthusiasm, when we have solidified and crystallized the eight-hour demand, when there is no room for doubt as to our attitude, then we will confer. And then will a conference be successful. Nevertheless the agitation for the conference continued. It has been held. We have the result. And we repeat, "When the employing book and job printers become convinced that we are determined in our efforts to secure the shorter workday, then will it be possible to confer with prospect for success."

The president, in referring to the Syracuse agreement, said in his report to the St. Louis convention:

In some localities employers insist that we are bound by the nine-hour agreement. On this point, a typothetæ circular says: "It must not be forgotten that the United Typothetæ of America has an agreement with the International Typographical as well as the other unions connected with the printing trades for a fifty-four-hour week, entered into at Syracuse in 1898, and that the terms of th agreement have never been changed, and mu remain in force until formal notice of withdraw or request for an alteration of its requirements h been submitted to the United Typothetæ of Ame ica."

A reading of the 1898 agreement referred to wi demonstrate conclusively the lack of basis for th statement made in the official circular. It on specified the dates on which the nine and one-ha and nine-hour day became effective.

The number of unions having the eight-ho day, those having arranged for the same, th unions then working less than nine hours but ha ing sent in no data for the shorter workday, an unions then working less than nine hours havin the eight-hour day arranged for, were given Circular No. 7.

Circular No. 8 set forth the action taken by th St. Louis convention, and which was then befo the referendum for its consideration.

Circular No. 9 again touched on the St. Lou plan, which had received a majority in the refe endum of 14,085.

Your committee reproduces herewith entire the report of the eight-hour committee to the S Louis convention, which was later submitted the referendum, and, as has been pointed ou adopted by that body.

Your committee on the eight-hour day h carefully considered that portion of the report President Lynch captioned "The Eight-Hour Day and which we are informed is intended as t report of the International eight-hour committe and has also had in review the circulars thus f issued by the International eight-hour committe seven in number. We have also had before President Lynch, who has explained fully and detail the various steps taken by the committe the work performed and the general object view.

After a careful review of the eight-hour mov ment and the documents indicated, we desire report to the convention as follows:

First—We endorse without reservation the wo and methods of the International eight-hour co mittee. We believe in this connection that t committee has thoroughly covered the ground a has put into effect every method that thus far h given promise of advancement to the eight-ho cause.

Second—We believe with President Lynch th "The eight-hour-day subject will not grow until the inauguration of the eight-hour day itself an event of the past rather than somethi that must yet be brought about."

Third—We regret that the eight-hour day book and job rooms is not a question at the pres time for adjudication between the Internatio Typographical Union and the United Typoth of America, but in view of the action taken by United Typothetæ of America in convention sembled at St. Louis, in which it is asserted "T the United Typothetæ of America declares it opposed to any reduction of the fifty-four-ho week," and "that the United Typothetæ of Amer will resist any attempt on the part of the Int national Typographical Union to reduce the pr ent hours of labor," no other conclusion is p sible. That an agreement on peaceable lines not now possible is solely the fault of the asso ated employers, and this contention is borne out the action of their last convention. Further, dispute the statement of the typothetæ that reduction in the hours of labor would be astrous to the employer. We maintain that eight-hour day is the logical workday, that it sufficient for the needs of the trade, and we g emphatic endorsement to the doctrine that the troduction of labor-saving machinery is not the benefit of the employer alone, but should result in better working conditions for the ployé in the way of reduction in the hours of toil and increased remuneration.

Fourth—The claim advanced by the typothetæ that it has an agreement with the International Typographical Union for a fifty-four-hour week which precludes any attempt on the part of our organization for a shorter workday or week, is not borne out by the terms of the Syracuse agreement, and we believe it is made at this time simply in furtherance of the intention to construct as many obstacles to the eight-hour day as is possible.

Fifth—We congratulate the International eight-hour committee on the large number of unions that have thus far succeeded in inaugurating the eight-hour day, or that have made arrangements under which the eight-hour day will shortly come into effect. In view of the fact that it took more than twenty years to bring about the nine-hour day, we have especial cause for jubilation over the progress that has thus far has been made toward the logical and inevitable eight-hour workday.

Sixth—We endorse the statement made by President Lynch, and we desire to impress it on the delegates to this convention and through them on the membership at large, that when the employing book and job printers become convinced that we are determined in our efforts to secure the shorter workday, then it will be possible to confer with the United Typothetæ of America with prospect for success.

After weighing carefully the various plans and methods that have been suggested to your committee, the committee recommends to the convention the adoption of the following preamble and resolution, which, when referred to the referendum and adopted by it, will place the International Typographical Union squarely on record on the eight-hour-day proposition, and indicate beyond question the date on which the eight-hour day shall become effective in all union establishments:

Whereas, In the movement for an eight-hour day for the book and job members of the Typographical Union, authorized by our Cincinnati convention, the international eight-hour committee has sought an agreement with the United Typothetæ of America, under which the eight-hour day could be made effective on a mutually satisfactory plan, and with the minimum embarrassment to the interest of our employers; and

Whereas, The overtures for peace thus made were refused and declined, and replied to with a threat, combined with a practical declaration of war should any effort be made to achieve the shorter workday, as witness the language of the resolutions adopted by the late typothetæ convention; and

Whereas, We reaffirm and again demand the eight-hour day for our book and job members;

Whereas, Your committee having carefully considered Propositions Nos. 35, 61, 62, 63, 98, 103 and 129, submit in lieu thereof the following:

Resolved, That we again declare our entire willingness to negotiate with the United Typothetæ for an agreement under which the eight-hour day will become operative, and so instruct our eight-hour committee.

Resolved, That an assessment of one-half of one (1) per cent on all moneys earned be levied upon the membership of the International Typographical Union for the purpose of a defense fund. Such fund to be held and expended by the subordinate union, except in those cases where no trouble is experienced in putting in operation the eight-hour day, and in such unions one-half of the assessment to be subject to call of the International officers for use in the furtherance of the eight-hour day as deemed in their judgment necessary.

Resolved, That on January 1, 1906, the eight-hour day shall become effective in all union establishments under the jurisdiction of the International Typographical Union, where existing contracts do not prevent, and in each instance where the eight-hour day is refused work shall cease.

In conclusion, your committee desires to urge upon this convention, and the membership at large, the advisability and necessity of adopting the resolutions herein set forth, and preparing in every way possible for effective action if resistance to the eight-hour day develops on or prior to January 1, 1906.

At the convention of the American Federation of Labor, held in San Francisco in November, 1904, President Gompers, in his report to the gathering, took occasion to say (see president's report):

The American Federation of Labor has been of incalculable benefit to a large number of international unions and local unions in the introduction and enforcement of the eight-hour workday, as attested by the large number of our fellows who now work under that rule. Inasmuch as the International Typographical Union has taken the initiative of its own accord in the matter of introducing and enforcing the eight-hour workday, I submit for your consideration and recommend that this movement of the International Typographical Union receive the sincere and hearty endorsement and co-operation of this convention of the American Federation of Labor, and of every union member, as well as every wage earner and those who sympathize with practical, evolutionary, economic progress.

It is not now known whether there will be any contest against the eight-hour day; whether any antagonistic action will be taken by the employers to the men. We do know, however, that at the last convention of the employing printers of the United States, organized under the name of the typothetæ, a resolution was adopted declaring against that movement. In any event, it seems clear to me that every action should be taken by this convention and by our organization generally, not only to pledge the support of the American Federation of Labor and its affiliated unions to the International Typographical Union in its effort to enforce the eight-hour day, but that a special committee be appointed by this convention to give the subject matter consideration; that the committee should consult with the officers and representatives of the International Typographical Union during the convention and report thereto before adjournment; that either that committee or another committee be authorized to be appointed for the purpose of co-operating with the executive council of the American Federation of Labor and the officers of the Typographical Union, so that the best possible aid can be rendered to our fellow workers in the great movement that they have undertaken, and in which they have the hopes, wishes, prayers and co-operation of every one interested in the welfare of the human family and the progress and civilization of our people.

Of course, in the effort to help one particular organization, especially in the laudable purpose it has mapped out for itself to achieve, we are not circumscribed or limited in our effort to help any and all of our fellow workmen who are in a position to make any effort for the advancement or promotion of their interests. We shall, therefore, welcome not only the initiative of our fellow unionists to obtain improved conditions, and particularly the improved conditions that come from a shorter workday, but we shall be glad to help in the initiation of any movement that will contribute in any way toward the protection, the promotion of the conditions and interests of our fellow workmen, and to render them every assistance within our power.

Your committee finds that the special committee to which was referred that part of the report of the president of the American Federation of Labor, treating of our eight-hour movement, made the following report, adopted unanimously by the convention and quoted in full in the report of the International president to this convention, and again quoted in full in this report:

We have had before us the president of the International Typographical Union, and we find that the movement for the eight-hour day for the book and job printers of the United States and Canada was inaugurated at the Cincinnati convention of the International Typographical Union, held in 1902, that it was further considered at the Washington convention, held in 1903, and that at the St. Louis convention, held in August of this year, it was decided that the eight-hour day should be enforced on January 1, 1906, and that for the financial support of this movement an assessment of one-half of one per cent should be levied on the earnings of all the members of the International Typographical Union.

Digitized by Google

This plan was submitted to a referendum vote, as provided by the laws of the International Typographical Union, and President Lynch informs your committee that the proposition received a majority of more than fourteen thousand votes. Therefore the assessment will become effective on January 1, 1905, and on January 1, 1906, effort will be made to put the eight-hour day into effect.

We are also informed that there is an association of commercial printers entitled the United Typothetæ of America, the employers' association. That the officers of the International Typographical Union have made effort to secure an agreement with the United Typothetæ under which the eight-hour day for book and job printers would become effective, and that the employers' association has thus far refused to enter into such an agreement. We are furthermore informed that the United Typothetæ of America is at present accumulating a defense fund in order that the eight-hour day enforcement may be combated. It is hoped by the employers to gather together at least $500,000. In view of the above your committee would recommend:

First—That the American Federation of Labor approve and endorse the movement under way by the International Typographical Union for an eight-hour day for the book and job printers of the United States and Canada, and pledge to the support of this movement both moral and financial assistance.

Second—That if at any time after January 1, 1906, the International Typographical Union desires the financial support of the American Federation of Labor, and if, after investigation by the executive council, such financial support is found necessary in order to insure victory to the printers, the executive council shall levy the constitutional assessment on affiliated bodies, this assessment to continue for such length of time as in the judgment of the executive council may be necessary.

Third—Your committee recommends that a committee of five members be appointed to act with the executive council in furthering the eight-hour day for the book and job printers.

And we desire to conclude this report by extending to the International Typographical Union the hearty well wishes of the American Federation of Labor for the success of the printers' eight-hour project.

Circular No. 11 urged the necessity for organization work, and asserted that the eight-hour day could be accomplished without friction if the proper organization effort was put forth.

Circular No. 12 gave the list of eight-hour unions on May 1, 1905.

Circular No. 13 gave the list of eight-hour unions on June 1, 1905.

Circular No. 14 sets forth the correspondence and facts in the St. Louis case.

Circular No. 15 gave the eight-hour unions on July 1, 1905.

Returning now to the report of the president to this convention, containing also the report of the International eight-hour committee, and that section of the report covering the eight-hour campaign, we desire to say, in entire agreement with the president, that there is but one subject before the International Typographical Union—the establishment of the principle of not more than eight hours' work for all members of the organization. We coincide with his statement,

All other problems, all other questions, all other propositions are incident to the great economic advancement that we are attempting, and which has met with success in many instances. Achieving the eight-hour day, betterments will follow naturally. Higher wages, if we are to accept the history of other organizations enjoying the eight-hour day, are sure to succeed its general introduction.

We find from the report of the president that there were issued during the fiscal year 10,000 copies of Eight-Hour Circular No. 8, 10,000 copies of Eight-Hour Circular No. 9, 35,000 copies of Eight-Hour Circular No. 10, 20,000 copies of Eight-Hour Circular No. 11, 3,000 copies of Eight-Hour Circular No. 12, and 18,000 circulars under the following titles: "Golden Nuggets," "Boost" and "Organize!" Attached to the latter were blanks showing the plan used by Chicago Typographical Union to obtain the names and addresses of non-union printers in the jurisdiction of No. 16 and the adjacent territory, and it is stated that this plan had been adopted by many locals. Total number of circulars distributed was 96,000, making 23,375 packages. One thousand nine hundred and sixty-seven boxes of eight-hour buttons, containing from 15 to 1,000 buttons, a total of 50,000, were also mailed to secretaries and presidents of local unions, eight-hour committeemen and chairmen of chapels. Ten thousand eight-hour buttons of special design were furnished to our Canadian locals.

Under the auspices of the United Typothetæ of America, mass meetings of employing printers have been held in St. Paul, intended to cover the northwest; Kansas City, intended to cover the southwest; Atlanta, for the southeast; Boston, for the New England states; Philadelphia, for the central states, and Milwaukee, for the central northwestern states. It is stated by the president that

At these meetings our eight-hour campaign is the sole topic for discussion, and resolutions are adopted pledging the attendants to oppose the introduction of the eight-hour day. As far as your president is aware, the main argument at the meetings is that the eight-hour day is impractical, and that it will ruin the printing business.

We agree with the president that we can not coincide with this view, and we are one with him in the belief that the eight-hour day will stimulate the printing business, and in the end will be of value to the employers as well as to the employe. It is significant, as stated by the president in his report, that in some instances the attendants at these meetings have returned to their home cities and signed eight-hour contracts with our local unions.

There is another statement contained in the president's report that is of extreme importance, and its significance should be carefully sought by this convention:

The executive committee of the United Typothetæ of America, at a meeting in Kansas City on April 11, the day succeeding the mass meeting of employers in that city, changed the arrangements for the 1905 typothetæ convention, and in this respect nullified the action taken at the St. Louis typothetæ session last year. The 1905 convention will be held in Niagara Falls, New York, the week of September 4. The St. Louis selection was Atlantic City, New Jersey, in June.

If, as the president intimates, the employers are led to believe that some action will be taken at this convention that will prevent the eight-hour day from becoming effective on January 1, then the importance of this gathering becomes at once doubly apparent. We trust with the president that our deliberations will give small comfort to the associations of employing printers who have announced their opposition to our eight-hour day.

Referring to the mass meetings of employing printers, we desire to quote that portion of the president's report in which he sets forth what he believes to be the objects of these meetings:

The organization of the employing printers is not the only object of these mass meetings, held at central points. It is realized by those in charge of the employers' campaign that in the ranks of all unions there is an element that always looks with apprehension on every forward movement. When storm clouds appear, it is this element that begins the cry for "peace at any price." Then there is the obstructionist and the member whose activity is measured by the strength and continuity of the criticism of others that is his chief characteristic. To overawe the timid and supply the critic with fresh ammunition is the main object of these "mass meetings." Only when our membership, by a majority of more than fourteen thousand votes, gave voice to the almost unanimous demand for a shorter workday in the book and job trade did the employers realize the strength and determination behind the eight-hour movement, and only then was it decided that mass meetings were required. The further action of the federation convention in San Francisco, pledging us monetary support if necessary, again alarmed the typothetæ. They saw that the negative position taken at their last convention was not having the expected effect, and they know that the demand of twenty-three thousand of their employes can not be smothered with resolutions. Then was the "mass meeting" idea brought to the front. It is for the timid member and the professional critic that these mass meetings are held, and behind them is the hope that our ranks may be broken and thus our object defeated. The answer rests with those who have all to gain—our members.

The Six-City conference, held at International headquarters in April, was timely and effective, and we endorsed the conclusions reached by that conference. We note that the conference referred to the mass meetings of employers alluded to in this report, and in this connection said:

We greatly regret the hostile activity of the United Typothetæ of America and other associations of employing printers in calling meetings for the purpose of arousing opposition to and denunciation of the eight-hour workday, and we fear that if this antagonistic course is continued the friendly relations now existing between the employers' organization and the International Typographical Union will be disrupted. We believe that the dignity and business interests of the organizations of the printing trade will be best served by conference and conciliation.

We also considered the section of the president's report covering the Detroit conference, and while that conference was without immediate result, we note that the following was adopted just prior to adjournment:

It is the sense of this body that the officers of the International Union and the officers of the United Typothetæ of America get together some time between now and January 1, 1906, in an endeavor to arrive at an amicable adjustment of this difference.

And we especially take cognizance of the concluding statement of the president's review of the eight-hour campaign that

The executive council of the International Typographical Union has been, and is now, ready and willing to meet the executive officers of the United Typothetæ for the purpose of endeavoring to reach an amicable adjustment of the eight-hour question, but all overtures to that end have so far failed to elicit a favorable response from the officials of the United Typothetæ.

We desire to report to this convention that on August 14, 1905, your eight-hour committee held a conference with a committee representing the United Typothetæ of America, composed of President Ellis, of Boston, Secretary Macintyre, of New York, and Messrs. Greene, of New York, Donnelly, of Chicago, and Nunemacher, of Louisville, members of the executive board of the United Typothetæ of America, and after a thorough discussion of the eight-hour question received the following proposition from the representatives of the United Typothetæ:

Mr. Max S. Hayes, Rossin House, City:

Dear Sir—As agreed at the joint committee meeting held today, I herewith send you the suggestions as outlined.

The committee from the United Typothetæ of America suggest to the eight-hour committee from the International Typographical Union that they recommend to the International Typographical Union convention, now in session, that it vote in favor of a reconsideration of the referendum vote taken last fall on the eight-hour day, and authorize a new referendum vote to be taken with the object of rescinding the resolution to make the eight-hour day effective January 1, 1906; or if the convention is unwilling to vote affirmatively on the above, that the convention shall empower the executive council to call for such referendum vote if at any time between now and January 1, 1906, the executive council shall consider it advisable.

Sincerely yours, John Macintyre, Secretary.

We especially endorse the idea of thoroughly organizing the so-called country printers, and we urge it on the membership so that on January 1, 1906, the jurisdiction may be thoroughly organized and our International union in condition to meet any warfare that may be forced upon it by employers resisting the general introduction of the shorter workday.

In this matter of organization we may well take a lesson out of the book of the typothetæ. For the past year they have strenuously made effort to bring within their ranks publishers of country newspapers, whom they had previously not only studiously ignored, but into whose job printing patronage they had continuously made sad inroads. They have succeeded in some instances by reducing their admission fees, but this bait has always failed with the country editor who fails to understand why he should lend himself to pull typothetæ chestnuts from the fire. However, it is our duty in this emergency to organize the country printers, and where they are not numerous enough in a town to obtain a charter they can, with little persuasion and by generous inducements, be prevailed upon to assume membership in unions contiguous to their respective towns. To this end your committee would suggest that they be permitted to affiliate with the local unions of their choice nearest their towns of residence. This plan is already in successful operation in some places, and we recommend the project to all the local unions in the International jurisdiction.

From the foregoing review of the procedur and documents in the eight-hour campaign, becomes at once evident that the Internationa Typographical Union has, from the inception o the idea, held itself in readiness to confer with th United Typothetæ of America, to the end that peaceful settlement of the demand involved migh be reached and that there might be the minimu disturbance of the conditions prevailing in th printing trade. It is also apparent that the Unite Typothetæ, on the other hand, has steadfastly op posed any reduction of the fifty-four-hour weel and has on every occasion, through its officer circulars and public press, made known that opp sition. As far as your committee is aware, th typothetæ has never modified the position take at its St. Louis convention, and, while its office have seemingly been willing to confer, they hav avoided acceptance of opportunities for confe ence, and at the employers' mass meetings the have uniformly advised aggressive resistance an warfare if necessary in order to prevent the ge eral introduction of the eight-hour workday. I therefore, trouble does occur, the typothetæ wi be alone responsible for the rupture of prese relations.

Taking into consideration the number of union that have obtained or have arranged for the eigh hour day, the magnificent condition of the Inte national treasury and of local treasuries, th gradual accumulation of a large fund through th one-half of one per cent assessment, the mor and financial support accorded by the America Federation of Labor in the action taken at its Sa Francisco convention and quoted herein, the unan mous support of other international unions, th healthy and growing sentiment among our ow membership in favor of the eight-hour day, w believe that the International Typographical Unio could not be in better position nor could there b better prospect for success for the movement.

As to the action that shall be taken by thi convention, your committee is of the opinion tha any change in the present program would o necessity have to be referred to the referendum The eight-hour proposition endorsed by the refe endum provides:

That on January 1, 1906, the eight-hour da shall become effective in all union establishment in the jurisdiction of the International Typ graphical Union, where existing contracts do no prevent, and in each instance where the eigh hour day is refused work shall cease.

There is no room for doubt as to the meanin of this provision. If an agreement between th International Typographical Union and the Unite Typothetæ of America is not reached prior t January 1, 1906, and if resistance to the introduc tion of the shorter workday is met with on tha date, it devolves on all the members of the Inte national Typographical Union working in unio establishments that decline to accede to the eigh hour day to at once cease work. In other word and in order that there may be no misunderstan ing as to the position of the International Typ graphical Union, no union printer can, after Ja uary 1, work in a union office more than eig hours per day, forty-eight hours per week, except in emergency and under overtime rates.

We believe that this convention should clothe the International eight-hour committee with power to negotiate with representatives of the United Typothetæ of America if opportunity for negotiation occurs prior to January 1, and we so recommend, in order that the declaration of the referendum

That we again declare our entire willingness to negotiate with the United Typothetæ of America for an agreement under which the eight-hour day will become operative, and so instruct our eight-hour committee, may not be impaired.

We further recommend that the executive council be empowered to protect unions, where the local or national typothetæ precipitate trouble, by requesting unions in contiguous territory to order strikes whenever the council may deem necessary for the protection of the unions involved.

We find that it is the apparent intention in some localities where job offices are owned by publishers of newspapers, to grant the eight-hour day in the newspaper department but not in the job department; therefore your committee would recommend that, where a newspaper and job office is being conducted at present by the same individual, firm or corporation, on a nine-hour basis, no settlement for the eight-hour day shall be made, that does not provide that it shall become effective in both departments.

We urge the delegates attending this convention, on their return to their unions, to at once bring this report before these bodies; to urge upon their unions the value of organization work by the appointment of special committees to forward such purpose whenever necessary, and also ask these unions to provide, if action has not already been taken, for the collection of a fund, in addition to that accruing under the one-half of one per cent assessment, so that on January 1 every gap may be closed and ammunition gathered with which to conduct warfare, if warfare is necessary..

Your committee, after thoroughly considering all of the facts recited in this report, after carefully scrutinizing all of the documents issued in connection with the eight-hour campaign, after interviewing the International officers and delegates to this convention, after in every way familiarizing itself with the vast subject submitted to it for consideration, finds not a single flaw in the methods and policy that have thus far been pursued by the International eight-hour committee, and we recommend that the continuance of the campaign and the further steps that are to be taken in order to secure the shorter workday be again committed to the International committee, with assurances of the full confidence of the delegates to the fifty-first session of the International Typographical Union.

Your committee would also recommend that the secretary-treasurer be instructed to incorporate in the book of laws the propositions providing for the establishment of the eight-hour day on January 1, 1906.

Concluding the report, your committee desires to reiterate the declaration of the International president that

We do not want the eight-hour day by reason of charity or philanthropy. We do not want it in order that our physical or mental well-being may be improved. We refuse to abandon our eight-hour demand because we may under present conditions be more fortunately situated than other artisans. We want the eight-hour workday because we are convinced that it suffices for the work there is to do, the work that is to be done, the demand of society for the product of the press. We propose to sell to the employer eight hours out of twenty-four, and we will do as we please with the remaining sixteen.

Yours for eight hours, fraternally,

MAX S. HAYES, Chairman.
ELMER THROSSELL, Secretary.
H. L. WHITE.
JOHN P. KENNEDY, SR.
GEORGE CRAMMOND.

At the conclusion of the committee's report Chairman Hayes made a stirring address on the shorter workday that aroused the convention to the highest pitch. The address appears in the review of the fifth day's proceedings, given elsewhere in this issue.

Samuel Gompers, of the American Federation of Labor, followed with a masterly speech along the same lines.

Delegate Cahill (St. Paul) moved that the report of the eight-hour day committee be adopted, and the secretary-treasurer be authorized to have the same printed in pamphlet form and distributed to the membership at the earliest possible moment.

The motion was unanimously adopted by a rising vote, amid scenes of great enthusiasm.

A CURIOUS FACT.

That Cicero had a very clear idea of what might result from the proper assemblage of letters is evident in the following extract from his "De Natura Deorum":

"Balbus, the stoic, in replying to Vellejus, the epicurean, opposes his atheistical argument that the world was made by chance, and says: He who fancies that any number of solid and invisible bodies could be kept together by weight, and that a world full or order and beauty could be formed by their accidental juxtaposition—from such a man I can not understand why he should not also believe that if he threw together, pell-mell, a great number of the twenty-one letters, either of gold or some other material, the Annals of Ennuis could be legibly put together from the forms scattered on the ground."

With this clear perception of the principle of composition, and the known fact that the Romans used hand stamps, both for impressing and printing from inked surfaces, it seems imcomprehensible that the art of printing, from movable types, had to wait until near the middle of the fifteenth century for "discovery."—The Stick.

THE SMITH CASE.

Report of Committee on Appeals—Adopted by the Convention.

TORONTO, August 15, 1905.

To the Officers and Delegates of the fifty-first Convention of the International Typographical Union.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN—The committee on appeals, to whom you referred Proposition No. 1 (by the executive council) as follows:

Appeal of the executive council from the action taken by Philadelphia Union No. 2 in relation to the enforcement of section 81, general laws of the International Typographical Union, in an instance of violation of the law called to the attention of No. 2 by the council. The papers in this case will be found on the desks of the delegates in printed form, entitled "The Smith Case."

Your committee summoned before it Messrs. James M. Lynch and J. W. Bramwood, two members of the executive council, appellants in this case, and Mr. Shelby Smith, the respondent. Upon request, Mr. Bramwood stated the case for the executive council, basing the ground for appeal on section 81, International Typographical Union constitution and general laws, which reads:

SEC. 81. Any member or members of any subordinate union circulating or causing to be circulated in any way malicious or untrue statements reflecting upon the standing or character, private or public, of any officer or member of the International Typographical Union, or impugning the motives or reflecting upon the honesty of any officer or member of the International Typographical Union, shall be deemed guilty of ununionlike conduct, and upon conviction before a trial board shall be suspended or expelled, as two-thirds of the members may determine. It shall be the duty of the executive committee of each subordinate union to investigate and prosecute all violations of this law occurring within its jurisdiction. It shall also be the duty, and it is hereby imperatively ordered, that any subordinate union, or any member of a subordinate union, shall prefer charges before the proper authorities against all violators of this section.

1. Mr. Bramwood then charged Shelby Smith, a member of Philadelphia Typographical Union No. 2, and editor of the Trades Union News of that city, with publishing derogatory statements regarding the members of the executive council of the International Typographical Union, individually and collectively, the most violent of which he read as follows:

EXECUTIVE COUNCIL OF I. T. U. AGAIN STABS No. 2 IN THE BACK.

RENDERS AID AND SUCCOR TO THE RATS IN THEIR FIGHT AGAINST THE UNION.

Had anything been lacking to convince the membership of the International Typographical Union of the deliberate intention of the executive council to destroy Typographical Union No. 2, it is supplied by the "open letter" of the council printed below.

Had anything been necessary to prove the interest of the executive council in neutralizing the effective fight of No. 2 against the scab Inquirer it is here supplied.

Had any evidence of the criminal refusal of the council to obey the plain letter of the law, supposed to govern its action, been missing, that evidence is here.

Had there been any proof needed that the executive council is in league with the rat employers and rat printers of Philadelphia against Typographical Union No. 2; that proof is found in their "open letter" of February 7.

John McNeal, president of the International Boilermakers' Union, was expelled for offenses less infamous than that committed by the executive council of the I. T. U. in the issuance of this "open letter."

So dastardly an attempt to injure a local union by the officers of a national organization charged with its protection and support has never been known. It is inconceivable that it can ever be repeated.

2. The above appeared in the Trades Union News of February 9, 1905. On February 25, 1905, the executive council of the International Typographical Union, in a letter to the president and executive committee of Philadelphia Union, called attention to the provisions of section 81 of the general laws of the International Typographical Union, recited the charges and derogatory statements that were particularly offensive, and called upon the union, through its president and executive committee, to comply with the provisions of the section in question, which specifically applies to cases of this character.

3. The question was subsequently brought to the attention of a meeting of Philadelphia Union, and a trial committee was appointed on March 18th.

4. Under date of March 20, the secretary of the trial board notified the individual (?) members of the executive council of the International Typographical Union, of the board's appointment, informing them that the first session to hear testimony would be held on Saturday, April 1, at 6 P. M., at Odd Fellows' Temple, Philadelphia, and requested that the committee be notified if it was the intention or desire of the executive council of the International Typographical Union to appear personally or by counsel.

5. The members of the executive council replied to this letter in a joint communication, drawing attention to the error of the committee in assuming that the council had presented charges against Shelby Smith, and again citing the provisions of section 81. The council, in this letter, emphasized the application of section 81 to this case, and contended that it was for the executive committee of No. 2 to act; that the council having pointed out the violations of the law, its duty ended therewith, for the time being; and asserted that, under the law, the member who made the charges must prove them, or take the consequences. The executive council in this letter further reserved the right to attend hearings of the committee, either personally or by counsel, and expressed a desire that it be furnished with a copy of the minutes of the meetings of the trial board, including the testimony, and the minutes of the meeting of No. 2 at which the report of the trial committee was acted upon.

6. In a further communication to the secretary of the trial committee, dated March 23, and with which was transmitted an attested copy of a communication received from Shelby Smith, and also an attested copy of the reply of the executive council to Mr. Smith, the members of the executive council of the International Typographical Union expressed themselves under oath as follows:

We further desire to emphatically assert that each step taken by the council in the Philadelphia case under review has been based solely upon the correspondence in relation thereto that has passed between your officers and organization committee and the executive council.

As union men and officials, we again most strongly resent any imputations to the contrary, or intimation that unfair employers or representatives thereof, or non-members of the organization, have been consulted on this or any other matter relating to union affairs in Philadelphia.

7. Under date of April 17 the secretary of Philadelphia Typographical Union transmitted to the executive council of the International Typographical Union the report of the trial board of Philadelphia Union in the case at issue. Briefly stated, Mr. Smith's main defense was that the article written by him and published in the Trades Union News, was justified by reason of the action of the council in declining to extend Philadelphia Union all the financial aid it had requested in its fight with the Inquirer. Special pleading was indulged in by Mr. Smith to excuse the statements in the article complained of, and in the headings thereto, and apparently the trial board ignored the real facts in the controversy.

8. From a reading of the report of the trial board, it is evident that the views expressed by the defendant, Smith, met with its approval. The report is replete with extraneous matter, not relating to the case at issue, and the committee attempts to prove that the statements made by Mr. Smith in the Trades Union News are not malicious or untrue, and that they were justified by the action of the council in not according Philadelphia Union all the support it had requested in the Inquirer fight; that its issuance of an "open letter," and the attitude assumed by it in its official communications, was further evidence of the hostility of the members of the council, and further justification for the statements made in the Trades Union News by Mr. Smith.

Before closing our side of this case permit me to draw particular attention to the various documents in the Smith case, including the report of the trial board, and to direct particular attention to the failure of Union No. 2 to furnish the members of the executive council of the International Typographical Union with copies of certain papers in this case, as requested in various communications. As copies of the pamphlet entitled "The Smith Case," were furnished the delegates prior to this convention, and as additional copies are at this time in the hands of the delegates, the executive council deems it unnecessary to deal further with the points at issue, being satisfied to rest their case on the facts submitted.

In reply to a question by your committee as to why he, Mr. Bramwood, as editor of THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL, used or permitted the use of the columns of that paper to give their side of the case and refused the same privilege to Mr. Smith and the members of the Philadelphia Union No. 2, he stated that the Trades Union News had unfairly attacked and attempted to blacken his and the character of the other members of the executive council, and as that was the only channel through which he could defend himself before the membership and the public, he believed he was justified in doing so.

STATEMENT OF THE RESPONDENT, MR. SHELBY SMITH.

Upon the chairman of the committee requesting Mr. Smith to submit testimony in substantiation of the article which appeared in the Trades Union News of Feb. 9, 1905, under the caption "Executive Council of International Typographical Union Again Stabs No. 2 in the Back," he, Mr. Smith, declined to answer, stating that he wished to demur for the following reasons: "He considers the committee on appeals has no jurisdiction in his case, and that they have no right to try same. That there is no law to uphold it. He further submits that he has been tried once according to the laws of the International Typographical Union; that there is no authority in the laws of the International Typographical Union for the re-trial of a member by a convention or by a committee of a convention. That it is a guarantee of the constitution of Great Britain and the United States that in the procedures of their courts a man shall not be twice placed in jeopardy for the same offense. He also believes his case is parallel to criminal cases tried in our courts of law—his union life being at stake. Mr. Smith, in addition, submitted that the executive council had forfeited their right to appeal when they failed to appear at the trial conducted by Philadelphia Union No. 2, after having been notified.

The committee after considering the demurrer came to the unanimous decision that: (1) The case could not be construed as parallel to a criminal case; (2) The committee having been created by the convention, which is the supreme and governing body of our International Typographical Union, we were within our jurisdiction in adjudicating upon any matter or matters that might be submitted to us; (3) The fact that the case had been tried by a local union did not preclude the right of this convention to re-try or review this or any other case affecting the discipline, or otherwise, of the members of the International Typographical Union.

Mr. Smith requested that the committee allow his co-delegates to be present during the hearing. Request granted.

Messrs. Kreft and Faries, delegates from Philadelphia Union No. 2 were then admitted, and remained throughout the hearing of the case.

Mr. Smith was then asked to make a statement or submit evidence, written or oral, in support of the following extract from his article:

Had anything been lacking to convince the membership of the International Typographical Union of the deliberate intention of the executive council to destroy Typographical Union No. 2, it is supplied by the "open letter" of the council printed below.

He then cited the following open letter in justification of the above statement contained in the Trades Union News:

AN OPEN LETTER.

"Philadelphia, with its thousands of non-unionists, is most dangerous to a large portion of our membership."—Extract from circular issued by Philadelphia Union No. 2, under date of December 22, 1904.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., February 7, 1905.

Mr. Alfred D. Calvert, President No. 2, Philadelphia, Pa.:

DEAR SIR—Again referring to the necessity for organization work in Philadelphia, the executive council desires an early and comprehensive outline of the methods that are to be followed by Philadelphia Typographical Union, as to the book and job branch.

We have had nothing definite relative to organization work since our communication to your organization committee, dated November 9, 1904. We are aware, however, that there has been an effort put forth by representatives of No. 2 to nullify International law, as interpreted by the executive council.

The Philadelphia work, as considered by and outlined to the Washington convention, provided for ORGANIZATION solely, and the executive council then expressed itself, through the International president as willing to continue to make appropriations until Philadelphia was "thoroughly unionized." The Philadelphia delegation, speaking through one of its members, said that the position of the council was entirely satisfactory to the Philadelphia delegates.

In a circular issued to the membership under date of December 22, 1904, it is stated by your union, over the signatures of its president and secretary, that there are "thousands of non-unionists" in Philadelphia. It is not apparent that any continued and determined effort has been made to organize these non-unionists. On the contrary, the main part of the effort thus far put forth is represented by a newspaper boycott that has been ineffective to date as to the result sought for. Even though the Inquirer fight may be won, it will then be necessary to take up and prosecute boycotts against the Press, the Record, the Item and the Bulletin, and it is only reasonable to suppose, with the Inquirer experience to guide us, that these boycotts will occupy many months, extending in fact far beyond January 1, 1906.

According to the data given in the non-unionist report of Philadelphia Union No. 2, received at International headquarters on July 8, 1904, there were 270 non-unionists employed in the five non-union daily newspaper offices in your city. We desire to call your attention to the fact that even though your union succeeded in bringing all these newspapers within the fold, such a result would only affect a small percentage of the "thousands of non-unionists" which you say are "most dangerous to a large portion of our membership."

As is herein pointed out, the work thus far undertaken in Philadelphia has not followed the plan placed before the Washington convention, and has not been along the lines of least resistance considered by that convention—the organization of the Philadelphia non-unionists. The council now demands that the work of organization shall be taken up, and that no effort shall be spared to thoroughly unionize Philadelphia in the book and job branch. If further time is wasted in opposing the executive council, so much less of value will be accomplished, and the continuance of present conditions will mean that the situation of every union book and job printer in Philadelphia will be jeopardized on January 1, 1906. If the eight-hour fight is lost in Philadelphia (and that is the prospect confronting us now), the result can not but disastrously affect the union newspaper printers and newspaper conditions. Also, the recruiting field represented by the "thousands of non-unionists" in Philadelphia will affect sister unions—New York, Washington, Boston and many others.

The council again expressed itself as willing to aid in the work of organization under the conditions set forth in its letter of November 9, 1904. And for the protection of the members of No. 2, and for the protection of the members of the International Typographical Union in adjacent territory, the council demands that your union act at once.

Fraternally yours,
JAMES M. LYNCH,
HUGO MILLER,
J. W. BRAMWOOD,
Executive Council of the International Typographical Union.

Mr. Smith argued that this open letter of the executive council was photographed by the local typothetæ and sent broadcast throughout the entire jurisdiction; used by the Inquirer solicitors in their canvass; and also tended to create dissension amongst the membership of No. 2, thereby rendering nugatory the effective fight being waged by No. 2, and pleaded that the action of the executive council was one of gross provocation. He then referred the committee to his defense before the trial board of Typographical Union No. 2 which will be found on pages 11 and 12 of the "Smith Case."

Mr. Smith was then requested to explain his reason, or submit documentary or oral evidence in support of the language in the undermentioned paragraph:

Had there been any proof needed that the executive council is in league with the rat employers and rat printers of Philadelphia against Typographical Union No. 2, that proof is found in their "open letter" of February 7.

Mr. Smith said: "To constitute a league between two or more parties it is not necessary that a formal agreement should exist, or even that there should be a definite understanding between them as to the particular acts each shall perform to accomplish a given result. If the end aimed at is the same; if the acts of the one party are in harmony with the acts of the other party; if the final result of the acts of the one are in cosonance with the aims of the other, that constitutes, to all practical intents and purposes, a community or league of interests.

"I think there will be no question that the aim of the rats and rat employers of Philadelphia today, so far as they may be said to have any aim in relation to the typographical union, is to render nugatory the fight being waged for the organization of the printers of this city. And for the purpose of showing how the non-union employers have seized upon the 'open letter' of the council and their other hostile acts, and used them to nullify the efforts of Typographical Union No. 2, I present the circular of the typothetæ showing the 'open letter' photographed."

(Exhibit "A" consists of a photographic reproduction of the open letter.)

Mr. Smith then asked the committee to note the following points: (1) Offer to cite extracts from Shakespeare placing a construction on the words "in league"; (2) Directs attention of the committee to the fact that the findings of the trial committee were approved by the members of Philadelphia Union No. 2, about 300 members being present, with only two negative votes; (3) That the executive council did not publish the "open letter." (4) That he made five requests on pages 9 and 10 of the "Smith Case," which the executive council did not comply with, as follows:

1. All letters, telegrams, or other communications received by the executive council or any member thereof, officially or personally, from representatives or employes of the Philadelphia Inquirer since June 1, 1904, and certified copies of the answers thereto.

2. All letters, telegrams, or other communications received by the executive council or any member thereof, officially or personally, from non-union printers in Philadelphia since June 1, 1904, and certified copies of the answers thereto.

3. All letters, telegrams, or other communications received by the executive council or by James M. Lynch, or John W. Bramwood, officially or personally, from members of No. 2—who are not members of the organization committee or elective officers of the local union—since June 1, 1904, and certified copies of the answers thereto.

4. All letters, telegrams, or other communications received by the executive council, or by James M. Lynch, or John W. Bramwood, officially or personally, which in any manner bear on or refer to the "Philadelphia situation," from the persons named below, and certified copies of the answers thereto, to wit:

L. C. Shepard, Grand Rapids, Mich.
George Dabney, Pittsburg, Pa.
V. B. Kinney, Omaha, Neb.
William Klinger, Chicago, Ill.
Michael Colbert, Chicago, Ill.
Ed C. Thrift, Detroit, Mich.
Thomas McConkey, New York, N. Y.
George Jackson, New York, N. Y.
Charles T. Scott, Boston, Mass.
Norman McPhail, Boston, Mass.
E. E. Calhoun, Washington, D. C.
A. F. Bloomer, Washington, D. C.
Harry Ogden, Cincinnati, Ohio.
John F. Quirk, Albany, N. Y.
Fred H. Brown, Syracuse, N. Y.
Elmer Throssell, Newark, N. J.

5. Copies of all letters from the council or any member thereof to any of the above parties or persons, whether in answer to letters from them or not.

He claimed the executive committee had evaded his requests in their letter of March 23 to the secretary of the trial board, in which they say:

We further desire to emphatically assert that each step taken by the council in the Philadelphia case under review has been based solely upon the correspondence in relation thereto that has passed between your officers and organization committee and the executive council.

As union men and officials, we again most strongly resent any imputations to the contrary, or intimation that unfair employers or representatives thereof, or non-members of the organization, have been consulted on this or any other matter relating to union affairs in Philadelphia.

The committee agreed that the executive committee be requested to give direct answers to the Questions 1 and 2, as to whether they were dealing or corresponding with employes of the Philadelphia Inquirer, and as to whether they had had correspondence or dealings with non-union printers in Philadelphia.

Mr. Lynch was summoned, and in answer to Question No. 1 stated specifically and emphatically that he had had no communication with any one connected with the Inquirer.

To Question No. 2 he answered that he had had no dealings or correspondence with any non-union printers of Philadelphia.

Mr. Bramwood was then called, and stated in answer to Question No. 1 that he had had no communication with the Inquirer either before or after the date mentioned; and to Question No. 2 he also stated that he had had no correspondence with any non-union printers of Philadelphia.

In re requests 3, 4 and 5, your committee decided that inasmuch as any correspondence that might be transmitted between the members of the executive council and the parties mentioned would be between members of the International Typographical Union, that the propriety of such, if it did exist, could not be legitimately questioned.

Mr. Smith was then asked if he had anything further to submit, to which he gave a negative reply.

This closed the case for both sides.

FINDINGS OF THE COMMITTEE.

In the minds of your committee, this is one of the most important questions that has ever been brought before an International convention. The laws of the International Typographical Union prescribe the duties of the executive council. Among these duties is the disposition of the defense fund. Certain rules are laid down, as to its disposition, by the laws of the organization, while its administration is placed in the hands of the executive council. The council, in exercising its rights and prerogatives under the law, as construed by the council, decided upon a certain course of action in the Philadelphia case. Its adherence to that plan is claimed by Mr. Smith and the trial board of the Philadelphia Union—and, in fact, by the union itself, through its adoption of the report of the trial board—to have been sufficient ground for the charge of being "in league with the rat employers and rat printers of Philadelphia against Typographical Union No. 2," of "rendering aid and succor to the rats in their fight against the union," and other statements of like character. We submit that this is an unjustifiable assumption on the part of any member or local union connected with this organization. If the unionism of the officers of the International Union, charged with the performance of certain duties, is to be thus grossly attacked and besmirched because official action may not meet with the approval of certain members or officers of a local union, or the local union itself, and the provisions of existing law are not strong enough to cope with such cases, it is high time that a law was enacted that will end, for all time, such flagrant procedure by those who wish to remain enrolled under the banner of the International Typographical Union. But your committee believes that section 81, properly enforced, is ample to cover the case in question. Its provisions are exceedingly plain, and the course of procedure is mandatory. We agree with the members of the executive council that the charges as outlined above, "if founded on fact, mean that the officers of the International Typographical Union constituting the executive council are not worthy to fill the positions they occupy; if not founded on fact, or if malicious or untrue, the provisions of section 81 apply." And those provisions set forth in a mandatory manner the punishment that shall be administered to one violating its provisions. In the case at issue not one scintilla of evidence—direct, documentary or oral—was produced before your committee tending to substantiate the charges made by Mr. Shelby Smith. The only defense put in by Mr. Smith is the one which he made before the trial board of Philadelphia Union, which we submit is not evidence at all. On the other side, the appellants (the members of the executive council) in the case defy the production of any such testimony, and they emphatically state, collectively and individually, that no such testimony existed. Your committee, therefore, believes that it is warranted by the facts as disclosed by both sides in coming to the decision that section 81 was deliberately violated by Shelby Smith, and that the trial board of Philadelphia Typographical Union purposely evaded the provisions of section 81 in handling this case, and rendered a verdict that had no evidence to sustain it. We therefore recommend as follows:

1. That Shelby Smith, who is now seated as delegate from Philadelphia Typographical Union, be expelled from the convention and his seat be declared vacant.

2. That Philadelphia Typographical Union be instructed by this convention to immediately expel Shelby Smith from membership in that organization, and it is the verdict of this convention that such expulsion shall remain in effect until such time as Shelby Smith shall make a full and ample public apology to the members of the executive council of the International Typographical Union, such apology to be published in THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL and Trade Union News of Philadelphia, and given such other publicity as may be deemed necessary. By the term "full and ample apology," we mean one that will be acceptable to the members of the executive council, whose personal and official characters have been thus wantonly assailed. If No. 2 fails to enforce this verdict within thirty days its charter to be revoked by the executive council.

In concluding its report, your committee desires to say that the problem before it was not one of sentiment, but one of rendering justice under our laws and according to facts. A question of the character covered in this report—involving the integrity of its chosen representatives—should not be passed lightly by. It is necessary for the International Typographical Union to take its place among the labor organizations which protect their officers and members from gross and malicious attacks of this nature. We further believe that a concurrence in the recommendations of this committee will show conclusively that the laws of the International Union are enacted for the guidance of its members and officers, and will be enforced without fear or favor.

Respectfully submitted,

P. M. DRAPER, Chairman.
H. B. AMES, Secretary.
W. H. JORDAN.
E. F. KENNEDY.
JOSEPH C. LARSON.

After a lengthy discussion the report of the committee was adopted by a roll call vote of 209 ayes to 34 nays.

CHANGES IN THE LAWS.

Constitution.

Below will be found the proposed amendments to the constitution favorably considered by the convention, which will be submitted to the referendum. They are followed by the changes in the general laws, by-laws, and the resolutions adopted. Unless otherwise stated, words in small caps indicate substitutions or additions, and those within brackets are to be eliminated.

FIRST PROPOSITION—Amend section 4, article i, of the constitution, so as to read as follows:

Section 4. The distinctive names of the several subordinate branches shall be: Of the printers, Typographical Union; OF THE MAILERS, MAILERS' UNION; OF THE WRITERS, NEWSPAPER WRITERS' UNION; OF THE TYPEFOUNDERS, TYPEFOUNDERS' UNION; AND OF OTHER ALLIED CRAFTS OR TRADES, IF SUCH THERE BE, THE DISTINCTIVE NAME OF EACH BRANCH.

NOTE.—The proposition is self-explanatory, the change appearing in small caps.

SECOND PROPOSITION—Amend article vi, section 7, to read as follows:

Section 7. It shall be the duty of the agent, in the event of the Union Printers' Home corporation neglecting or refusing to comply with the provisions of the deed under which the land on which the Home is situated was transferred, or disobeying any of the orders of the International Typographical Union, to enter upon and take full possession of the property as the custodian of the International Typographical Union: PROVIDED, THAT IT SHALL BE THE DUTY OF THE AGENT TO ATTEND AT LEAST ONE MEETING OF THE BOARD OF TRUSTEES DURING HIS TERM OF OFFICE.

NOTE.—The proposition is self-explanatory, the change appearing in small caps.

THIRD PROPOSITION—Amend article viii, constitution—"Salaries and Expenses"— as follows:

Section 1. The salary of * * *
For President, $2,100 per annum.
Secretary-Treasurer, $2,100 per annum.

NOTE.—The secretary-treasurer was instructed by the convention to insert a note at the bottom of this proposition on the referendum ballot explaining that the proposed increase in salaries will not cause an increase in dues or per capita tax.

FOURTH PROPOSITION—Amend article viii, section 3, to read as follows:

Section 3. When any officer or member is required to perform service away from his home, he shall be allowed, in addition to the amounts set forth above, first-class railroad fare by the shortest route to and from his destination, and ACTUAL HOTEL EXPENSES: PROVIDED, THAT AN ITEMIZED BILL SHALL IN ALL CASES BE RENDERED.

NOTE.—The present law provides for "hotel expenses not in excess of $3 per day." As itemized bills are required in other portions of existing law, the only change is in the allowance for hotel expenses, as noted in small caps.

By-Laws.

Amend section 3, article iii, by-laws, by striking out the words "alphabetical order" and inserting in lieu thereof the words: Arranged in the order of receiving the highest number of nominations (when a tie occurs the name to be drawn by lot)," etc.

Strike out that part of paragraph "C," section 3, page 27, Book of Laws, 1905, commencing with fifth line, quoted below:

"A list of all rejections, expulsions, suspensions and reinstatements, made and reported by subordinate unions."

NOTE.—By action of the convention, this law is now in effect.

Amend section 4, article i, to read:

Section 4. No persons other than duly elected delegates AND OFFICERS SHALL BE ACCORDED THE PRIVILEGES OF THE FLOOR during the sessions of the International Union except by unanimous consent of the convention; but, when requested, a representative of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, or the United Typothetæ, shall be heard on important changes in the laws affecting their interests.

Add following to section 6, article iii:

Provided further, That the vote of unions situated at such a distance from headquarters that the returns can not reach headquarters within the prescribed time, shall be counted upon receipt of same.

General Laws.

Amend section 45, general laws, by striking out words, "This shall not apply to unions located within five miles of each other, when the current working card of the nearest union shall hold good for thirty days," and insert in its place: "Provided, This shall not prevent sister unions located within a radius of five miles mutually agreeing to recognize each other's current working cards for a period of thirty days."

To amend section 66, page 56, of the general laws, by adding the following:

Provided, That nothing in the foregoing shall be construed to mean that machine offices may not employ help to wipe or clean machines, or fill metal pots; however, such help shall not be employed in excess of one man to each fifteen machines, or fraction thereof.

Amend section 72, general laws, to read:

Section 72. Subordinate unions shall not allow proprietors who work at the trade, and who are not active members, to use the union label on any work performed by such proprietors. PROVIDED, THAT IN CITIES WHERE LOCAL UNIONS PROHIBIT OR DISCOURAGE PROPRIETOR MEMBERSHIP THE LABEL CAN BE GRANTED TO SUCH OFFICES THAT ARE OTHERWISE UNION, TO BE USED ON WORK PERFORMED BY UNION MEN. Local unions shall have the right to grant the use of the label to any proprietor who is an active member, when he wishes to do his own work, and, where union help can be obtained, works not more than the established number of hours per day in any week.

Strike out all of section 80, general laws, under the head "General Discipline," and substitute the following:

Section 80. Not more than FORTY-EIGHT hours shall constitute a week's work. No member of a subordinate union shall work more than six days in a week, nor more than the number of hours constituting a day's work in any jurisdiction multiplied by six, where a substitute can be obtained. Should any member work, through inability to secure a substitute, a greater number than six days in any one week, or more than the number of hours specified in this section, said member must give to the first available substitute all such extra days (or hours, to be specified by the local union), and shall work a correspondingly less number of days in the succeeding week, so as to bring the average number of days within a maximum of six days per week. All violations or evasions of this law shall be punished by a fine of not less than one day's minimum pay for each violation. And it shall be obligatory upon the part of the local union in whose jurisdiction said violation occurs, to impose and collect such fine. Six-day papers publishing Sunday editions shall be classed in the category of seven-day morning papers.

Amend section 87, general laws, to read:

Section 87. Work in foreign languages shall be at the scale rates of the particular union having jurisdiction. Provided that in no case shall English composition be at a lesser rate than that of the Typographical Union. NOR SHALL FOREIGN COMPOSITION IN ENGLISH OFFICES BE DONE AT A LESSER RATE OR LONGER HOURS THAN IS IN VOGUE IN OFFICES UNDER JURISDICTION OF SUCH FOREIGN LANGUAGE UNION.

Amend section 94, general laws, to read:

Section 94. Foremen of printing offices have the right to employ help, and may discharge (1) for incompetency, (2) for neglect of duty, (3) for violation of office rules (which shall be conspicuously posted) or of rules of the chapel or union, and (4) to decrease the force, such decrease to be accomplished by discharging first the person or persons last employed, either as regular employees or as extra employees, as the exigencies of the matter may require. Should there be an increase in the force [within sixty days after a decrease], the person or persons displaced through such cause shall be reinstated in the order in which they were discharged, before other help may be employed. Upon demand, the foreman shall give the reason for discharge in writing. Persons considered capable as substitutes by foreman shall be deemed competent to fill regular situations, and shall be given preference in the filling of vacancies in the regular force. This section shall apply to incoming, as well as outgoing foremen.

NOTE.—The words "within sixty days after a decrease" are stricken out.

Strike out all of sections 96, 100 and 136, general laws, and substitute the following sections in their respective places:

Section 96. The selection by foremen of their forces from day to day, or not having any regular situation in an office, is prohibited. Foremen must give out such minimum number of situations as are needed to meet office requirements. Employment other than a regular situation shall be classed as extra work.

Section 100. Phalanxing by foremen, or giving out six-day situations on seven-day papers, thereby controlling extra work, constitutes a sublist. Any member in an office, seven-day paper or otherwise, is entitled to employ in his stead, whenever so disposed, any competent member of the International Typographical Union, without consultation or approval of the foreman of said office. A fine of $25 shall be imposed upon foremen for violation or evasion of this law. Any chairman failing to report the violation of this section shall be fined $25.

Section 136. The interchanging, exchanging, borrowing, lending or buying of matter previously used, either in the form of type or matrices, between newspapers or job offices, not owned by the same individual, firm or corporation and published in the same establishment, is unlawful, and shall not be allowed: Provided, That the reproduction of such type or matrices shall be deemed a compliance with this law.

NOTE.—The word "practice," etc., in the present laws is eliminated in the substitute.

Amend section 123, general laws, to read:

Section 123. When a strike has been inaugurated under the provisions of sections 114, 115 and 117, the executive council shall pay to the order of the president and secretary of the union involved, FOR SUCH TIME AS THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL MAY DEEM WISE, an amount equal to $7 per week for each married man and $5 per week for each single man entitled thereto.

Amend section 131 of the general laws by adding the following:

No member holding active membership in any local union shall sign an individual or private contract with any employer, agreeing to work for any stated length of time, wages or conditions. The union alone has the power to contract for conditions, wages and hours.

Add a new section under head of "Apprentices," to read:

Section —. All apprentices employed on daily or weekly newspapers, magazines or publications of any description, under the jurisdiction of the International Typographical Union, where machine or typesetting devices are in use, must be employed the last two years of their apprenticeship on the case, and at all the intricate handiwork of the craft, excepting the last three months of said apprenticeship, which time may be devoted exclusively to work on linotype or typesetting devices in use in the office where said apprentice is employed. Four years to constitute an apprenticeship term.

Strike out section 12, article v, of the by-laws, and amend the general laws by inserting under the heading "Recommendations" the following:

Section —. The International Union in convention assembled, calls to the attention of the executive the importance of giving to the smaller unions a fair and equitable apportionment in the appointment of committees.

Amend the general laws by adding new section as follows:

Section —. Subordinate unions shall fix a time and date for regular monthly meetings that will permit members holding situations on seven-day newspapers to attend these meetings.

Amend the general laws by adding a new section, to read:

Section —. It is deemed to be the duty of all members of the International Typographical Union to give preference to union made goods, whenever such articles can be obtained, in preference to non-union products. Subordinate unions shall provide such penalties as local conditions warrant.

Add a new section to the general laws to read:

Section —. Subordinate unions shall create a standing label committee, whose duty it shall be to encourage by systematic campaign the use of the allied printing trades union label and union printing labels where allied printing trades councils do not exist.

Resolutions.

The convention adopted the following:

That the president is hereby requested to appoint a committee of three, who shall thoroughly investigate and report to the next convention a plan for the inauguration of a system of pensions and relief for aged and sick members.

That the International Typographical Union go on record as favoring a law to make railroad tickets transferable.

That the International Typographical Union pledge its support to the press telegraphers in their eight-hour movement.

That it is recommended that local unions furnish THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL to registered apprentices within their jurisdiction.

That local unions are urged to use their influence to have public libraries in their jurisdiction use as far as practicable books bearing the label.

That the attention of the membership be directed to the fact that the Inland Type Foundry has locked out members of St. Louis Union No. 8.

That it is the sense of the International Typographical Union that officers and members of local unions aid and encourage the organization of woman's auxiliaries.

That the International president be instructed to continue the work in Louisville until such time as in his judgment No. 10 is again in control or further effort is unnecessary.

That the International Typographical Union send a representative to the next general conference of the Methodist Church South, to urge the unionizing of the Methodist Publishing House at Nashville.

That the official battle cry of the International Typographical Union in the agitation for the eight-hour day be: "We propose to sell to the employer eight hours out of twenty-four, and we will do as we please with the remaining sixteen."

That the subordinate unions of the International Typographical Union be encouraged, assisted and urged to establish technical libraries, and otherwise work for a still more efficient workmanship among their members and apprentices.

That the International Typographical Union, in convention assembled, tender the American Federation of Labor and President Gompers their sincere and heartfelt thanks in proffering their moral and financial support in the shorter workday.

That the executive council, if in its judgment it be for the best interests of the International Typographical Union, consult with Mr. Hearst as to the advisability of starting a paper in Philadelphia, on the same broad lines of his other papers.

That the secretary-treasurer be authorized and instructed to pay to the Canadian Trades and Labor Congress a per capita tax of 1½ cents monthly on all members of the International Typographical Union in good standing in the Dominion of Canada.

That the International Typographical Union, in fifty-first session assembled, hereby acknowledges its deep appreciation of the friendly attitude assumed by William R. Hearst toward organized labor and his material assistance in the fight against the Los Angeles Times.

That the names of A. T. Proctor, late of Cleveland; John C. Ivers, late of Kansas City; John Sexton, late of Indianapolis; Edward F. Clarke late of Toronto; H. J. McGrann, late of Memphis and Charles Allan, late of Jacksonville, be placed on the list of deceased members.

That the secretary-treasurer shall send a circular letter to the secretary of each local union embodying the following extract from the International Typographical Union laws of 1905, page 58, section 76: "All local unions must pass laws defining the grade and classes of work apprentices must be taught from year to year of their apprenticeship with the aim in view that they may have the opportunity of acquiring a thorough knowledge of the printing trade." Also the following from section 139, page 73, International Typographical Union book of laws: "That it is the sense of the International Union that subordinate unions shall make every effort possible to secure the proper training and instruction of apprentices in offices under their jurisdiction to the intent that they may become competent workmen."

HOW THEY TREATED US IN TORONTO.

It was the eight-hour convention. It was the biggest and most enthusiastic gathering ever held by the International Typographical Union. It was the most harmonious convention. It was the most businesslike convention. It was the best convention. The foregoing are but a few of many expressions of a like nature heard on every side from habitual convention-goers at Toronto as the week came to a close. That it was the biggest convention in point of numbers will be readily conceded. The chairman of the local arrangements committee says that 1,580 persons were in attendance—including delegates, ex-delegates and visitors. This is the number that registered at the union's headquarters in the Rossin House. There were probably a number who did not register. The great number attending was a surprise to the citizens of Toronto and to the hotel keepers in particular. In fact, it was a surprise to everybody except the arrangements committee—nothing surprised them. They were ready for everything, and certainly acquitted themselves in a manner that will ever be remembered by those in attendance. There was absolutely no hitch in any of the arrangements, and the entertainment program was carried out to the letter, each succeeding feature seeming to be better than the preceding one.

Many, in fact the greater part of the delegates and visitors to the convention, went by way of Niagara Falls, spending a few hours at that place. The wonderful Niagara, the trip from there to Lewiston down through the awe-inspiring Rocky Gorge, and the delightful ride across the lake will never be forgotten by those who went to Toronto.

The boat arriving at Toronto at 5 o'clock on Saturday afternoon carried perhaps the largest single party to the convention. It was on the boat that the card fiend first began his work—and he never stopped till the convention was ended or he ran out of cards. And here it may be said that the cards carried by those in attendance at Toronto were many of them very beautiful specimens of the art we practice. There were fewer "freak" cards in evidence than there have been for several years. Almost all the bits of pasteboard bore some sentiment boosting the eight-hour movement.

The first sight to greet the eyes of the voyagers on pulling into the beautiful Toronto harbor was the Colorado Springs delegation of boosters arrayed in feathers and war paint, with Scotch pipers and drummers at their head, making the welkin ring with their yell for "Colorado Springs, 1906." It was right at this point that the delegates and visitors were impressed with the fact that Colorado Springs was after the next convention, and they were not allowed to forget the fact all week. Certainly such a picturesque campaign for the honor of holding the convention has seldom been seen.

The visitors were quickly taken in hand by the various members of the reception committee and conducted to their hotels. At the local committee room at the Rossin House all were asked to register, and on so doing were presented with beautiful badges and books of tickets for all the entertainment features. The souvenir book of the convention was an excellent piece of workmanship and will be highly prized by all as a reminder of the "time of our lives."

On Saturday evening at 8 o'clock the delegates and visitors were entertained at a reception in the parlors of the headquarters hotel—the Rossin House. Music by a splendid orchestra and "all kinds" of refreshments made the evening an enjoyable one. The ladies in attendance—and their name was legion—were taken care of by the Toronto Woman's Auxiliary.

Sunday afternoon at 2:30 boats were taken for Hanlan's Point, a beautiful pleasure resort situated just across the harbor from the city. A very enjoyable band concert by the Highlanders' Band was listened to, and at 5:10 a special boat was taken to Island Park, where a sumptuous repast was waiting. After the inner man was satisfied to the fullest with solid and liquid refreshments, the return trip was made to Hanlan's Point for the evening concert.

Monday morning at 9 the convention opened in the Labor Temple. This fine building, which the trade unionists of Toronto own, is one of the most complete institutions of its kind to be found anywhere. The structure is situated on Church street near the center of the town, and is provided with every convenience. The large assembly hall was ample for the needs of the convention, and the seating arrangements were excellent. A commodious gallery running entirely around the main hall provided a splendid place from which the lady visitors could view the deliberations of the convention.

At 1:45 Monday afternoon everybody was taken for a car ride around the city. As an incidental to the car ride a stop was made at one of the large breweries, where we were surprised to find a splendid repast spread in the spacious cellar of the establishment. The car ride ended up at the wharf, where boats were waiting to take the crowd to beautiful Island Park. Here the famous Cadet Band, one of the best organizations in Canada, gave a pleasing concert during the remainder of the afternoon. At 5 o'clock was a garden party and once more were our appetites satisfied to the fullest extent. The remainder of the evening was spent either dancing in the pavilion to the music of Glionna's orchestra or listening to the concert by the Cadet Band.

On Tuesday morning the convention began to get down to business, but it didn't seem any use, because the entertainment committee had planned to take us through another brewery, and the invitation was too tempting to be refused. So at 1 o'clock the convention was adjourned, and most people proceeded to the establishment of Eugene O'Keefe, two blocks from the Labor Temple. The brewery was turned over to the International Typographical Union for the rest of the afternoon. They took us down into the cellars where they keep it and told us to help ourselves. Long tables were spread in the cool underground storerooms and a splendid lunch was served. Good fellowship reigned supreme, songs were sung, stories told, speeches made and everybody voted it one of the best times of the week. On leaving Mr. O'Keefe's place each visitor was presented with a neat souvenir of the occasion.

On Wednesday, at 1:45, the large steamer Mojeska was boarded at the Yonge street wharf and the whole party was taken across the lake to the city of Hamilton. They were met at the Burlington piers by a committee from Hamilton Union and given a car ride around the bay, through the city of Hamilton and up the incline railway to Mountain View Park. Here, at 5:30, dinner was served. From this park a most magnificent view is obtained. The whole city of Hamilton lies directly beneath, and stretching out in front of it is the bay, and beyond that the lake. The Highlanders' Band, which accompanied the party, gave an entertaining program, and at 8:30 the party started on the return trip, arriving in Toronto late at night.

Thursday the convention said: "Get thee behind me, Satan," and absolutely refused to listen to the seductive pleadings of "Jumbo" Stevenson of the committee. Sessions were held morning and afternoon, but in the evening the entertainment committee took charge again and all were taken for a moonlight sail on Lake Ontario in the steamer Chippewa. The Highlanders' Band and Glionna's Orchestra were taken along. There was dancing and also refreshments in abundance. The return to the city was made at midnight. On Thursday afternoon the lady visitors were taken for a car ride and a trip through the City Dairy, where a lunch was served and beautiful flowers and souvenirs given all.

Friday three sessions of the convention were held. At 5 o'clock in the afternoon all assembled on the steps of the Municipal building and were photographed.

Saturday was "getaway day." A short session was held in the morning, and the body adjourned to meet "out Home" in 1906.

Toronto is a beautiful city, its residents are a warm-hearted and hospitable people, and many of the visitors, as they sailed away across the bay into the lake, leaving behind the scene of a week's enjoyment, listening to the bells of Toronto, meditating on the hearty greeting and the sincere Godspeed they had received—wished they could begin all over again.

Toronto, you did yourself and the International Typographical Union proud! When do you want the convention again? Us for you. A VISITOR.

WHEN history is written our "trade agreement" idea will be given place in importance alongside of the Magna Charta and the Declaration of Independence. It partakes of the best in both without the shortcomings of either. It aims at getting the best possible conditions with the least possible injury to either employer or employe. It is sufficiently elastic to move with the times, so will not become obsolete or hamper progressive thought and action. It does not eliminate striking, for that would be a species of slavery, but it comes near doing so in that by voluntary action disputes can be settled by conciliation and arbitration which would otherwise require force, ending in favor of those best able to resist, whether or not they were in the right.—James Duncan in American Federationist.

THE seasons come and go; winter stays the processes of the growth of vegetation and seals the rivers. Spring comes often with torrents of rain and destructive floods; the mighty powers of nature sometimes take the form of hurricanes and cyclones; summer's heat sometimes burns and destroys. Autumn comes sometimes with the failure of the harvest; but the years come and go. Winter brings its joys, spring and summer their beauties, and autumn its abundant harvest and rejoicing. So with the labor movement. It meets the cold blast of hate, the flood of abuse, the heat of anger, and the temporary defeat of its purpose; but the years will come and go, and the hate and the anger and the opposition will cease and all men will rejoice in the success of its mighty efforts.—George E. McNeill in American Federationist.

THERE may be those among us who hold that the attitude of the public toward trade unionism is a matter of slight moment and not worth bothering about. This opinion may be correct as applied to some specific instance in trade union activity, but it is not true as a general proposition. The organization of labor has won a wide public recognition for its useful industrial and social service, and won it, moreover, in the face of an early prejudice against it. It is idle to say that either individuals or associations can afford to disregard the way in which they are looked upon by the great mass of the people. The union has a character to maintain as well as the individual, and there is always weight to be attached to the criticism of unbiased observers.—Frank K. Foster in American Federationist.

HAD organized labor done no other or greater work than to compel the academic philosopher to leave his study and consign his eclectic nostrums to the sinkhole of antiquity, draw him into human contact with live men and women, and begin anew in their rudiments his investigations on the laws that relate to the production and distribution of wealth, it would still have fulfilled a mission of glorious importance; but it has done more, and the shrieks, groans and tears of the Parryites is increasing evidence of its ability to afford ample protection and ultimate emancipation from the tyrannies imposed by modern industrial conditions.—John Roach in American Federationist.

THE trade union movement in America, or in any other country, is comparable to the great movements of the crusaders in the middle ages. The very flower of the country banded together in a movement for the promotion and attainment of something which will redound to the good of their whole number. A shibboleth has always been sounded by every marching host. What better cry can labor have to knit more closely its own ranks, to produce more and stronger leaders, to echo across other planes and catch the air of those who have not as yet fallen into line, than the cry of an advancing standard of life?—Kellogg Durland in American Federationist.

OFFICIAL BATTLE CRY OF THE I. T. U.

We propose to sell to the employer eight hours out of twenty-four, and we will do as we please with the remaining sixteen.

A CORRESPONDENT from Texas gives his notion of the ideal workday in the following characteristic language: "Eight hours for work, eight hours for sleep, eight hours to do as we damn please." Inelegant but expressive.

DO YOU remember, dear reader, the typothetæ circular mentioned in these columns several months ago, in which the employers' body, after citing the failure (?) of the eight-hour day in El Paso and in San Francisco, declared that the employing printers were "going back to the nine-hour day" in those places? The editor of THE JOURNAL merely calls attention to these things in passing to show what typothetæ statements amount to.

AFTER the lesson learned in San Francisco it should be a long time before a body of employing printers again seeks the co-operation of the notorious citizens' alliance. As a rule the employing printers are men of too much intelligence and standing to be identified in any manner with such a disreputable concern as the citizens' alliance has proved itself to be. It is to be hoped, in the interests of both employer and employe, that hereafter the employing printers will steer clear of all such unholy alliances.

EVERY once in a while a few rat shops in a town will post notices in their composing rooms announcing their intention of conducting "open shops." Then the Associated Press gets busy, and dispatches are sent broadcast announcing that the open shop has been instituted in that city. Then a few weeks afterward, when the printing offices of the same city sign agreements with their employes, conceding the union shop and the eight-hour day, the press of the country is remarkably silent. How strange this is!

THE unanimous and enthusiastic manner in which the Toronto convention indorsed and reiterated the purpose of the International Typographical Union to stand pat on the eight-hour platform is certainly a plain answer to the typothetæ agitators who have been trying to deceive the employers into believing that we did not know what we wanted. Now, it's up to you, Mr. Employer—you who said you would grant the eight-hour day in case the convention did not modify the union's demands. We have spoken in no uncertain tones—there will be no backdown on our part. We are going to have the eight-hour day, even though we have to fight for it. The terms are plain: Eight hours January 1, 1906. Are you with us or against us?

THE American Printer for August, among other nice things said about the Union Printers' Home, has the following: "When one contemplates the ease and comfort of a place like this with the hard lot that would be the portion of a destitute printer bowed down by disease, he is inclined to feel that this one circumstance alone is sufficient to justify the existence of the Typographical Union." Coming from a publication that is not friendly to the Typographical Union, the foregoing is all the more valuable.

A CONVENTION of delegates representing the unions of Connecticut and southern Massachusetts will meet in the city of New Haven on Thursday, September 28, in Music Hall, 117 Court street. Eight hours will be the subject of discussion. The last meeting of delegates from this district was held in Hartford, June 15.

ACCORDING to reports, C. W. Post has secured control of an immense sanatorium at Battle Creek, and intends to convert it into a home for printers, with the stipulation that no discrimination be made between unionists and non-unionists. Post will have his little joke.

IT was an eight-hour convention.

Detroit, San Antonio, Chicago.

On Wednesday, August 10, non-unionists were put to work in several offices in Detroit, and as a result the members of Typographical Union No. 18 employed in twenty-five offices were called out, and the eight-hour fight was on in Detroit.

On Tuesday, August 15, non-unionists were employed in three offices in San Antonio, and the members of No. 172 employed in these offices declined to remain at work, and the eight-hour contest was on in San Antonio.

On Saturday, August 26, non-unionists were put to work in R. R. Donnelley & Sons', Rand, McNally & Co.'s, and several other offices in Chicago, and the members of No. 16 employed in these offices promptly accepted the gage of battle, and five hundred of them are out. The eight-hour fight is on in Chicago.

In each instance the issue was made by the proprietors, and the steps taken by them were with the deliberate intention of bringing on a conflict. Inasmuch as the International Typographical Union provided that the eight-hour day should become effective on January 1, 1906, the International officers, in every instance where a local union desired to enforce the eight-hour day by strike prior to the date set for its general introduction, has declined sanction and assistance, and prevailed on the union to forego its intention. It was the idea of the International officers that if peace could be maintained opportunity might be afforded for a satisfactory adjustment of the eight-hour contention. These officers, however, promptly supported the local unions in Detroit, San Antonio and Chicago, and, under International supervision, the contests in these towns, and others where a fight is forced by the employers, will be maintained until the local unions are successful, the eight-hour day in effect, or arrangements perfected for it to become operative on January 1.

In San Antonio the employers have a few strikebreakers on the ground, under the leadership of the notorious Northrup. As this article is written, the strike has been on in Detroit for three weeks, and the employers have secured about twenty-five alleged printers. Only a dozen or so non-unionists were available in Chicago. Not only the union members, but the apprentices and copyholders joined in the Chicago walkout. In short, the tie-up is complete in Detroit, San Antonio and Chicago.

Local officers and unions should be alert and render all possible assistance to their brothers in Detroit, San Antonio and Chicago, and should promptly report by wire to the International president any information that is of value.

In the meantime organize thoroughly your local jurisdiction and vicinity. The belligerent employers may select you for the next target.

The Convention Spoke.

Eight hours! Amid scenes of enthusiasm never to be forgotten by those present, the Toronto convention reiterated the demand of the International Typographical Union for the eight-hour day. Not one dissenting voice was raised, not a single compromise proposition was offered—each delegate came to the convention with but one purpose in view. That was to add the endorsement of his union to the shorter workday movement. President Ellis, of the United Typothetæ of America, mounted the ramparts of the "last ditch," and told us we would have to fight. And the unanimous chorus came back from the fifty-first convention: "We are ready."

The Toronto convention of the International Typographical Union made economic history. Workingmen, in the years to come, long after the decent workday is established in all trades, will look back on the printers' convention in the city of Toronto in the year 1905 as the place where a decisive stand was made for the eight-hour day.

There were many details that contributed to make the convention noteworthy. In the first place, the high character of the delegate body was noted by the press and public of the city of Toronto. Seldom has an assemblage of any kind brought together such a number of intelligent and earnest men. Careful and conservative in their every action on the floor of the convention, yet conscious of the all-important issue before them, they were determined that the voice of the International Typographical Union in demanding the eight-hour day should be heard above any and all other matters.

The address of that veteran of the labor movement, Samuel Gompers, was listened to with intense interest. His remarks were almost entirely devoted to the eight-hour movement. The ovation he received on concluding his address was spontaneous and hearty.

But perhaps the most remarkable scene ever witnessed in a trade union convention was that on the conclusion of the address of Max Hayes, chairman of the convention eight-hour committee, when the report of the committee was adopted by a unanimous rising vote. The long anticipated time had arrived when each delegate could show his endorsement of the movement. Cheer after cheer rang through the hall, and the applause lasted for several minutes. It was a conclusive answer to the ultimatum of President Ellis two days before. It had men behind it—not empty assertions and question-mark circulars.

Many employing printers over the country have been waiting to see what the Toronto convention would do regarding the eight-hour day. They should be satisfied now.

The convention spoke, and in no uncertain tones.

Eight hours for work, eight hours for sleep, eight hours to do as we will.

January 1, 1906, is the date.

Organize.

Post to Publish a Magazine.

C. W. Post will this month begin the publication of a magazine. The name of this is to be "The Square Deal," and it is announced that its purpose will be to further the work of the Citizens' Industrial Association, of which the gentleman is president. It is further announced that Wilson Vance is to be the editor, and "discussions of the open and closed shop will be welcomed in its pages." It is not stated whether the union label will appear on the publication or not. We extend our best wishes to C. W., and hope that he may at least get as many subscribers as D. M. Parry secured for his magazine.

"Go Get a Reputation."

The United States census reports for 1900 give the total number of factories in the United States as 512,339. According to data obtained from the proceedings of the annual meeting of the National Association of Manufacturers, the membership of that body is, at the outside, 3,000. This latter figure is undoubtedly a very liberal one. The exact membership was not stated by the secretary at any time during the convention, nor were the figures included in his report. But vague references were made during the proceedings to "our three thousand members," and at one point in the proceedings, in answer to a question, the presiding officer stated that the membership was about twenty-eight hundred. So let us be generous and grant that the National Association of Manufacturers has a membership of three thousand. Dividing this three thousand into the total 512,339 factories in the country (and there are probably more than that now), we find that the membership of the manufacturers' association is about one-half of one per cent of the total number of factories. According to a little booklet booming the city of Indianapolis, recently issued by the commercial club, it is estimated that 2,500 factories are located there. We feel safe in venturing the assertion that there are more manufactories in the city of Indianapolis that do not belong to the manufacturers' association than there are members of that body in the whole country. And Indianapolis is not such a manufacturing city, either. As the Hon. Dave is so fond of saying that organized labor represents but a small per cent of the workers, THE JOURNAL would suggest that he "go get a reputation."

THE most striking part of the program of Mr. Macintyre in San Francisco was his attempt at importation of rats from the east. When one takes into consideration the fact that a few years ago the Pacific coast was the stronghold of the long-tailed fraternity, he must be impressed with the fact that some wonderful organization work has been conducted out there by the Pacific. The act of Mr. Macintyre, had it taken place a few years ago, would have been indeed carrying coals to Newcastle.

Those Mysterious Figures.

A recent typothetæ circular contained the statement that if the printers of the country were aware of the actual cost of material, labor, etc., in the conducting of a printing plant, they would hesitate at demanding a shorter workday.

When the typothetæ press agent gets on the subject of increased cost of production he begins to veil himself in mystery—the subject of estimating profit or loss is assumed to be entirely too deep for the average journeyman printer to comprehend. The typothetæ press agent mysteriously says: "If you only knew how to figure these things as we do you would see differently," etc.

THE JOURNAL would most respectfully ask the press agent of the typothetæ if he does not know it to be a fact that the greater number of printing offices in this country employ members of the typographical union to do their estimating? Just call to mind the leading offices of your own city. Is it not a fact that, in a majority of cases, the men who prepare the bids are or have been members of the union? The average proprietor has confidence in the journeyman printer's knowledge of the actual cost of material, labor, etc.

A Just Demand.

What arguments have been presented against the shorter workday by the employers? To be sure, the talking delegates of the typothetæ have made the assertion that the employers of the country will be driven out of business by the enforcement of the eight-hour day. Even if we concede that the typothetæ, or its agents, have authority to speak for the vast majority of employers who are not affiliated with that body, that assertion will be conceded by all fair-minded men to be ridiculous. In contravention of the statement that the printing business would be ruined by the shorter workday, we have but to point to the many large branches of industry that are being conducted on the eight-hour plan. The newspapers are all governed by the shorter hours. The building trades only work eight hours. The cigarmakers have the shorter workday. The government limits the day for its employes to eight hours. Cities all over the land are doing business on that basis. Why can not the printing business be conducted on the same plan? It is not different from any other branch of industry. It lives off the consumer in the same manner as does every other business in the land. The profits are not less, and may be greater, than many other businesses afford. The assertion that printing offices will be closed and employers be ruined if the eight-hour day is inaugurated is a childish utterance, and ill befits men of such supposed intelligence as those composing the typothetæ.

Liberty vs. License.

A few of the labor papers of the country have seen fit to distort the action taken in the Smith case by the International Typographical Union—speaking through its chosen representatives in convention assembled—into a blow at the liberty of the press. These same papers have also tried to becloud the minds of their readers as to the purposes of the International Typographical Union in so summarily dealing with this matter.

The editor of THE JOURNAL feels warranted in asserting that there was no thought of throttling or abridging the freedom of the press in the minds of any of the delegates who voted for approval of the committee report, setting forth the guilt and providing for the expulsion of Smith. Such a limitation was never considered for a moment. Many of the speakers upheld the freedom of the press, but opposed unbridled license to abuse under the guise of liberty.

Smith was expelled for violating the laws of the union of which he was a member. Those laws were placed on the books by the membership of the International Typographical Union—not by the officers—and the membership prescribes the penalty for disobedience of union law.

If the law under which Smith was expelled is distasteful to the membership, it is rather remarkable that, out of nearly 50,000 members and 260 delegates, not one submitted a proposition to the convention seeking to change the law.

Smith was expelled for gross violation of section 81 of the general laws of the International Typographical Union. He was expelled for maliciously and falsely charging, through the columns of his paper, that the members of the executive council of the International Typographical Union were consorting with rats; that they were "stabbing a local union in the back;" that they were "in league with the rat employers and rat printers in Philadelphia," and that they "were rendering aid and succor to the rats in their fight against the union." The issue was a clean-cut one. The assailed officers took the position that if the charges were founded on fact, they should be immediately dismissed in disgrace from the organization. They repeatedly challenged the production of any evidence, direct or indirect, in proof of these charges. SMITH CONFESSED THE UTTER LACK OF EVIDENCE TO SUBSTANTIATE HIS CHARGES.

Digitized by Google

With few exceptions, even those who voted for a censure rather than expulsion, in the belief that leniency should be extended, afterward expressed themselves as convinced of Smith's guilt, and denounced the methods pursued by him.

We publish elsewhere the complete report of the committee on appeals in this case. It comprises the evidence submitted and the findings of the committee. The subject is also covered in the review of the fourth day's proceedings, which includes the statement of Smith, in which he confessed his inability to produce evidence to substantiate the statements complained of, and the roll call vote adopting the appeals committee's report.

A perusal of the report of the appeals committee and the action taken in this case will clearly demonstrate that the few labor editors referred to in this article are "strangers to the truth" when they assert that the Toronto session struck a blow at the liberty of the press.

A noted author says: "Liberty sometimes runs to license, not because it is bad in itself, but because human passion perverts its principle."

The desire of a very few labor editors to place themselves in the limelight in the guise of martyrs was rather to be expected by those who best know them. But the rôle of martyr is not proving very popular nowadays. We predict that for their own protection, and in the interests of labor journalism, the reputable labor editors will in the end be compelled to ostracize the few scandalmongers who are now disgracing the profession.

Policy of The Journal Again Endorsed.

The committee on TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL of the fifty-first session of the International Typographical Union, in session at Toronto, unequivocally endorsed the policy of the official organ. The following paragraph is taken from the committee's report:

We, your committee on Typographical Journal, beg to report that we heartily endorse the policy of The Journal, believing under the course pursued that it keeps the membership in close touch with each other, as well as trade conditions, and the report of the secretary-treasurer as to the financial success of The Journal is especially gratifying.

The report of the committee was unanimously adopted.

In this connection we quote from the minutes of the convention:

Chairman Anderson stated, in connection with the report from THE JOURNAL committee, that in the past few days the action of this convention in enforcing its laws had been distorted and construed by certain persons in attendance here as an effort to muzzle the press. The chairman stated that for the benefit of those who might be appealed to by such argument, and in justice to the convention, he wished to say that the convention had taken absolutely no such action and had not attempted to stifle nor muzzle the press, and that no man who spoke or voted on the proposition had any such intention. That the convention had only enforced its laws, which provide against the circulation of malicious, false or scurrilous literature or statements; that a labor editor or any other editor was entitled to criticize this organization, its officers or members, the convention only demanding that when charges are made they shall be founded on fact, and language held within the bounds of decency. This is demanded by the laws of the land, and is all that the action of the convention implied, or intended to imply.

EMPLOYER AND EMPLOYE, of Minneapolis, says: "Right is might and might is everything, and 'because we are right' the Typographical Union will go on winning victory after victory until it marches its whole army of 50,000 workmen over the eight-hour line."

THE label—that's all.

Union Labor's Growth.

In connection with THE JOURNAL'S article last month on the proportion of unionists in the country, Ethelbert Stewart, of the United States Department of Labor, sends us the following article along the same line. THE JOURNAL'S figures in connection with the subject were, of course, based on the number of persons in the country supposed to be eligible to membership in the unions. Mr. Stewart takes the whole population as a basis, and the figures he presents are extremely interesting:

Whether or not trades unionism is a "foreign" institution, its spread in the United States has been very rapid.

At the close of 1904 England, Scotland and Ireland, with a population of 41,500,000, had a trades union membership of 1,902,308. In other words, 1 in 22 of the population was a trades unionist. In Germany there were 1,276,831 trades unionists in a population of 56,400,000, or 1 to 44. In France, with a population of 38,300,000, there are 715,576 trades unionists, or 1 to 53. Italy, with 32,500,000 population, reports 181,230 members of trades unions, or 1 to 180. In Austria the trades unions have 177,592 members in a population of 26,150,000, or 1 to 150. Spain has a population of 18,600,000 and a trades union membership of 56,900, or 1 to 330. Hungary has 52,410 trades unionists in a population of 19,250,000, or 1 to 366. In Denmark the ratio is 1 to 28 and in New South Wales 1 to 21.

In the entire United States the ratio is 1 to 29, while in the state of New York it is 1 to 18, and in Illinois 1 to 16.7. In Colorado, with 411 trades unions, a total membership of 48,837 is reported, which is 1 to 11 of population. In agricultural states, like Missouri, the ratio of trades union members to total population is, of course, less. Yet not too much should be inferred from this, since the proportion of organized to unorganized workers in given trades may be very large in these very states. For instance, the state bureau of labor statistics of Missouri reports that the 98,102 members of the 741 local trades unions in that state constitute 79 per cent of the people working at the trades indicated.

The trades unions of most European countries are fairly well equipped financially. Reports for 1904 show Austrian trades unions' receipts to have been $599,472, expenditures $541,031, balance on hand at end of year in cash $767,630. Most other countries present a similar showing. In England the per capita tax on members is higher than in any other country, being approximately $9 a year. British trades unions have large benefit features, however, which constitute 42 per cent of their total expenditures. Thus nearly one-half of the high dues of British trades unions goes back to the members as sick or burial benefits and in life insurance policies. In 1904 26.6 per cent of the total income was paid out in "out of work" benefits, which are different from sick benefits and life insurance account. Thus 68.4 per cent was returned to the members in benefits other than strikes, which cost in the way of strike benefits and other forms of strike expense 9.1 per cent of the income from the per capita tax. The running expenses of the unions—that is, mere administrative cost—amounted to 22½ per cent of the income from the per capita tax.

The growth of trades unions in various countries has been steady, if we take a series of years. If we compare 1901 with 1904 in England, for instance, there is a falling off, but comparing 1894 with 1904 there is an increase from 1,414,800 in the former year to 1,902,308 in the latter.

In France the growth of trades unions has been steady since 1890, when 1,006 unions had 139,692 members, to 1904, when 4,227 unions had 715,576 members. In only one year was there a setback, and that was in 1898, and even then the number of unions increased, although the number of members decreased. France still has 151 mixed unions of the old guild type, admitting to membership both employers and employes. Even these unions are increasing in membership, though decreasing in numbers. In 1903 there were 156 of these guilds, with 33,431 members; in 1904 the number of guilds decreased to 151, but the membership increased to 36,044.

Austria had 1,308 unions, with 70,342 members, in 1892. In 1904 it had 2,469 unions, with 177,592 members. At the latter date there were 5,653 members of the old guild type of organization in Austria.

The first trades union in Denmark, organized for the specific purpose of securing higher wages and shorter hours, came into existence in 1869. There were other organizations of a semi-political character. Up to 1884 trades unionism was confined practically to Copenhagen. Denmark now has 1,213 trades unions reporting 88,098 members. The membership has been falling off since 1902, though the number of unions has steadily increased. In 1902 the membership was 96,479, the number of unions 1,193.

The first trades union in Sweden was that of the printers of Stockholm, organized in 1846. A few unions were scattered here and there from 1846 down to 1885, when the real trades union movement of Sweden began. The printers formed a national organization in 1886, the first national union. By April, 1899, there were eleven national unions, and these at that time formed the National Federation of Labor. At the beginning of 1904 there were twenty-six national unions in this federation, with 800 local unions and 40,000 members.

The printers of Norway formed the first national union in that country October 1, 1882. There are now 310 unions, with 15,347 members, in Norway. In Norway, as in every other country in the world, the printers have been the first and most progressive along organized lines. The fifteen national unions of Norway are all organized on the plan adopted by the printers in 1882. In 1899 a National Federation of Labor was formed, and at this time all the national unions, fifteen in number, are affiliated with it.

In November, 1889, the general workingmen's federation of Spain had twenty-seven affiliated unions and 3,355 members. In March, 1904, there were 352 unions and 56,900 members. There are but three industries in Spain that have a trades union membership of over 5,000. These are the building trades, where thirty-five unions have 10,263 members; the marine workers, an "industrial union" taking in sailors, dock laborers and fishermen, with twenty-four unions and 8,918 members, and the woodworkers, with thirty-nine unions and 5,199 members. Spain has 3,436 union printers. The agricultural laborers, who in the United States have never been able to organize, have in Spain a union with 3,317 members.

Digitized by Google

A Bulgarian national federation of labor was organized in August, 1904, with seven national unions as charter members. October 15, 1904, there were but 3,000 members of trades unions in Bulgaria.

Nowhere, however, have trades unions developed so rapidly as in New York, Illinois and Colorado. July 1, 1894, New York had 860 unions with 157,197 members; September 30, 1902, it had 2,229 unions with 329,101 members. Illinois, with less than 900 unions, including Knights of Labor assemblies, in 1886, had January 1, 1904, 1,750 unions and 300,000 members. Colorado's trades unions increased even faster proportionately.

Country Employers Not to Be Fooled.

Secretary N. C. O'Connor, of Minneapolis (Minn.) Union No. 42, writes THE JOURNAL as follows: "Our work in the country is successful far beyond my expectations. Nearly every mail brings in an application or a letter stating that the boys are with us. Thus far thirty-eight country papers have come out for us in this fight, and only one against us." The secretary incloses a clipping from the Faribault (Minn.) Daily Journal, which has the following to say editorially anent the deluge of typothetæ "literature" that is being inflicted on the country printers:

The Journal, like most other papers, is in receipt of frantic appeals from both employing printers and their employes to take one side or the other in the approaching contest regarding the eight-hour day which the International Typographical Union has ordered its members to secure. As between the typothetæ and the printers, the former seem more unreasonable, as they charge $2 to join their organization. One can advocate the cause of the men for nothing. It is not for this reason, however, that the Journal regards the cause of the men as just. The eight-hour day is coming, as it should come, and there is no sort of manual labor in which it would produce more beneficial results than in the exhausting and laborious work of the printer. The employers say that they will not be able to make anything on their printing under the new system, but if labor is advanced uniformly all over the country prices will be raised uniformly. The only place where prices can be lower will be in the country, and the Journal is selfish enough to see no great harm in that. For years the printers of the Twin Cities have taken thousands of dollars' worth of printing out of Faribault because of the saving they made by utilizing certain advantageous conditions in the line of printing, and now that these conditions may be taken away they ask aid of the men whom they have injured. No country printer who knows his own advantage will aid the employing printers in resisting the efforts of the men to get an eight-hour day. If the strike comes he is apt to find his men leaving him for the cities, to take the places of the men who have struck. He will be flimflammed on every side. Let the city printers, who by a combine made the state pay about 60 per cent more than it ought to have paid last winter for a good deal of printing, fight their own battles.

Stereotypers Uphold the Agreement.

At the recent convention of the Stereotypers' and Electrotypers' International Union in the city of Chicago, the subject of abrogating their agreement with the International Typographical Union was brought up. In support of the agreement the following statement was presented to the convention by the executive board:

To the International Stereotypers' and Electrotypers' Union in Convention Assembled, Fourth Annual Session, Chicago, Ill.:

GENTLEMEN—As the agreement we have with the International Typographical Union for organizing, offensive and defensive purposes has been the subject of considerable criticism from certain members of our union, who seem to be endeavoring to create the impression that its continuance is detrimental to our present and future welfare, and realizing that if such was a fact the executive officers of this union would either be derelict in their duty in not immediately apprising the membership of its detrimental character, or else they would be unfitted, through mental incapacity, to properly safeguard the interests which the membership by a decisive vote elected them to conserve, we desire to emphatically state on behalf of the executive board of the International Stereotypers' and Electrotypers' Union that we unanimously favor a continuation of this agreement, with the modification which will be necessary if the delegates and referendum see fit to establish an official journal, because of the fact that the present prosperous and improved conditions enjoyed by our membership are due more to that agreement than any other cause, and our rapid growth and prosperity since January 1, 1902, when it became effective, will confirm this statement. We wish further to state (and we are in a position to know) that our union has never been denied any privilege, benefit, aid or assistance to which we were entitled by the terms of that agreement, nor have we ever been treated unfairly or unjustly on any question which came before the joint defense board, created by this agreement, and on which board we have representation. We sincerely hope that our members will not be led astray by hasty declarations or assertions which will not bear the light of investigation, and in conclusion beg to state that we believe perfect organization of the entire printing trade will not be attained until all the international printing trade unions have a joint agreement similar to the very satisfactory one we have at present with the International Typographical Union. Fraternally yours,

JAMES J. FREEL,
J. FREMONT FREY,
JESSE W. MORELAND,
M. J. SHEA,
GEORGE W. WILLIAMS.

The proposition to abrogate the agreement was beaten by a vote of 35 to 20. New York city gets the next convention of the stereotypers and electrotypers.

The Typographia.

General Secretary-Treasurer Hugo Miller has just published his thirty-second annual report of the Typographia, covering the fiscal year from July 1, 1904, to June 30, 1905. The report shows a total income of $24,231.34 and a total expense of $21,798.08, leaving a surplus of $2,433.26, which brings the general fund of the Typographia to $25,592.57, or to $26.59 per capita. This amount does not include the funds of the local unions, which also amount to quite a sum. Typographia No. 7, of New York, for instance, has $7,794.49 in its general fund and $5,008.07 in its local fund. The dues of each member to the general fund during the fiscal year, not including the eight-hour assessment, amounted to $24.60, namely, fifty-two weeks at 45 cents and eight burial assessments at 15 cents. Seventeen members died during the year and three invalid members withdrew, each receiving the sum of $100 for yielding their further rights on the Typographia. The following benefits were paid during the year: Out-of-work, $5,105; sick, $4,835.45; funeral, $3,995; traveling, $136.46, and for organizing work at Philadelphia, $611.50.

On May 1, next year, the Typographia will celebrate the twentieth anniversary of its success in inaugurating the eight-hour workday in nearly every German printing office in this country, and at the same time General Secretary Hugo Miller can celebrate his twentieth anniversary as the executive officer of the Typographia. That this organization stands foremost in beneficial features is best shown by the fact that one of its members in New York city, who has been so unfortunate as to become blind, has received more than $1,500 as sick benefits and is still getting financial assistance.

Some Statistics.

The following figures are taken from the United States census reports for 1900:

There are in the United States 512,276 manufacturing establishments, employing a total of 168,583 children under sixteen years of age. The total wages of these children for the year preceding the census was $25,661,692, or an average of $152 per year for each child. This is about $3 per week.

Employed in these 512,276 manufactories were 4,114,348 men, whose wages aggregated for the year $2,019,954,204, or an average of $490 per man per year. This is about $9.50 a week.

In the Good Old Days.

In last month's JOURNAL were several items taken from The Printer of October, 1859. The following is an extract from the same publication of May, 1859, and is a part of the official report published in that periodical of the eighth annual convention of the National Typographical Union, held in the city of Boston. In view of the fact that the custom of entertaining delegates on their way to the convention city prevails to such a great extent at the present day, the following account of Big Six's blowout in honor of delegates passing through New York city may be of interest:

They (the returning delegates) were accompanied on their homeward trip by Messrs. Harrington and Madigan, as a deputation from Boston to deliver them over to the "tender mercies" of the printers here (New York). Early on Saturday forenoon they rendezvoused in Nassau street, close by the New York Times and Tribune offices, in three elegant stages, each drawn by four fine horses—preparatory to a day's drive to High Bridge and back. The day was fine and the delegates and committee of reception in high spirits. So, off they started (making several calls by the way) to get a hasty glance at the famous acqueduct which leads the "Croton" across the "Harlem" and lands it "high and wet" over the Washington Heights, in the capacious receiving reservoir. The day passed rapidly, and, although a visit to the public institutions was contemplated, it was found necessary to return to the city direct, in order to partake of a banquet hastily prepared by order of the reception committee, at Florence's Hotel. Supper discussed, champagne began to circulate, and speeches, toasts and sentiments were the order of the evening. The hour of eight arrived, and the company adjourned to Laura Keene's Theater, where seats had been reserved for their special accommodation. The guests and their entertainers were mutually pleased with each other and with their day's amusement; and friendships were formed, which, we doubt not, will terminate only with the lives of the parties. The only regret was on the part of our printers that they had but a few hours' notice to prepare for the reception of their brethren on their arrival.

Be Consistent.

You don't smoke scab cigars or buy scab goods on Labor day, do you? You insist on every bit of printing used in connection with the celebration bearing the label. You refuse to march behind a non-union band. You make it your business to see that the horses are shod by unionists. You even demand union-made canes. You are fairly aching to find some unlucky individual without labels all over him. You are not ashamed of the fact that you are a union man. You throw back your shoulders and march down the street, confident of your ability to whip every non-unionist in the land.

Then the parade disbands, the celebration ends, you go home and go to bed, tired out from your exertions in demonstrating what a good union man you are.

Next morning you get up, eat some scab breakfast food, put on your old scab coat and hat, and start for work. On the way down you stop and get a cigar, unmindful of the fact that there is no blue label on the box. A little non-union chewing tobacco is probably included in your morning purchases.

And so you continue through the day, and probably through the other three hundred and sixty-four days of the year.

Make every day Labor day.

THE trade union movement does not need apologists; the time will come when it will not need defenders.

Union Shop vs. "Open Shop."

Recently members of the debating societies of George Washington University and Georgetown University engaged in a debate as to the merits of the open shop as opposed to the union shop. A late number of the Bricklayer and Mason reports the debate, and we quote the following from that magazine, selected from the arguments advanced on the union shop side:

The country is full of employers' organizations whose express purpose is the advocacy of the open shop. They even publish periodicals in its behalf. One of them bears the name The Open Shop, issued, they frankly tell us, without regard to expense. Some employers, moreover, like Messrs. Parry and Nunemacher, have become itinerant lecturers on the blessings of the open shop.

On the other hand, laborers and labor organizations are known to favor either the closed or the union shop, and the great majority of them are actively opposed to the open shop. In fact, we challenge the affirmative to show us a single important group of laborers which is actively working for the open shop and against the union shop. Is it necessary to explain these familiar facts? Does it require much keenness to perceive that behind such phrases as "individual liberty" and "the spirit of '76" lies the employers' desire for lower wages, longer hours and untrammeled quest of profits? Shall we not infer that the employers' interests, and not those of the laboring classes, are subserved by the open shop? For if that inference be false, the employers' advocacy of the open shop, combined with the laborers' opposition to it, can be explained only on the preposterous assumption that employers—bless their dear souls—know the interests of the laborers better, are more concerned to have them prevail, and are more willing to spend time, money and energy in their behalf than the laborers themselves—poor, benighted brutes.

The closed union is a thing of the past, and any comparison of a union with a trust is fundamentally false, since a trust spends money to kill its rivals, while a union spends it to help them and make co-workers of them.

As for the so-called abuses of unionism, we contend, with Professors Ely, Brooks, Gilman and scores of others, that these are only temporary and exceptional, not inherent in unionism. You can no more condemn unionism for these abuses than you can condemn Christianity for the horrors of the Inquisition. Moreover, these abuses are far outweighed by great and permanent benefits. Unions, again, are temperate and conservative in proportion to their age and strength. The violent union is the weak or the young union. You will not find the old, well-established union demanding more than the employer can pay, because such a demand would mean loss of work; and when the factory shuts down the workman has more to lose than the employer, for his very living depends upon steady employment at a fair wage. Unions have leaders quite as familiar with the industrial situation as the average employer. Gide, whose text book on economics is used both at Georgetown and George Washington universities, says expressly: "All that unions seek to do is to obtain wages justified by the state of the market. It is not their purpose to fix wages arbitrarily."

The day is long past when unions require moral, legal or economic justification. Particularly in this country is it necessary and right for laborers to unite.

Still more convincing proof of the effects of the union shop as compared with the open shop is found in such concrete cases as the following, which we stand ready to prove as authentic in every particular. Most of them, in fact, are from the report of the industrial commission:

In 1893, in open shops, American woodworkers received 80 to 90 cents per day of eleven hours. Under the union shop in 1896 they received $1.25 and $1.50 for a day of ten hours, and today they receive $2.52 for a day of nine hours.

In 1897 the establishment of the union shop in the bituminous coal regions raised wages 30 to 40 per cent at a time when wages elsewhere rose but 3 to 4 per cent.

According to the recent report of their secretary, blacksmiths before establishing the union shop received an average wage of 26 cents per hour, and afterward 36 cents per hour.

Electrical workers in 1897, under the open shop, received $2.50 per day. Soon after the establishment of the union shop wages rose to $5 per day.

Iron workers who received 25 to 27½ cents per hour in open shops were paid 45 cents after establishing the union shop.

According to John B. Lennon, the union shop has raised wages among the tailors of America 25 per cent and made conditions of work better.

Boiler makers and iron ship builders in open shops get $1.75 to $2 a day, while those in union shops are paid $3 to $3.50.

Such instances as these are illustrations of a general rule, the reasons for which are plain enough. Combine the workers and they can get the wages which their services are worth to the employer. Separate them and they must accept the employer's own terms.

Just one further observation before I conclude. A short time ago the supreme court of the United States decided that it was a violation of the constitution for any state to pass laws regulating the hours of employment. This leaves the laboring classes without any redress through legislative enactment for the enforcement of a decent workday, so as to enable them to enjoy at least some of the blessings of life. Where shall they now look for help? Shall it be to the employer or the open shop? Go to the sweatshops of this country, where the open shop prevails in all its glory, and ask some of those unfortunate victims of filth, misery and disease how long they work each day, and the answers that come from these so-called free and independent workmen are such as to put the blush of shame even upon the feelingless cheeks of Mammon. Day and night they work, with no intermission save a few moments now and then to gulp down a bite of food and steal a little sleep. The sunken eyes, blanched cheeks, shriveled bodies and stunted minds of these unfortunate beings are the living exhibits which we offer as evidence of the ravages of the open shop. Therefore, since neither legislation nor the open shop can remedy these evils, labor's only salvation lies in the union shop, where the union enforces sanitary conditions of employment, institutes a decent workday and secures for every workman a fair day's pay for a fair day's work. If you deny the laboring classes the benefits of the union shop they will in their despair, as a last resort, rush into the eager arms of socialism or anarchy, and thus plunge this country into the throes of a political and industrial revolution.

Resolutions by Presbyterian Assembly.

The general assembly of the Presbyterian Church, at its recent meeting at Winona Lake, Indiana, passed the following resolutions:

Appreciating the increasing importance of the industrial problem, and realizing that the labor question is fundamentally a moral and a religious question, and that it will never be settled upon any other basis, we recommend that the Presbyterian Home Mission Committees appoint sub-committees for the purpose of making a systematic study of the entire problem in their respective localities.

These committees shall co-operate with the newly-organized workingmen's department of the board of home missions, thus establishing, in connection with the organized Presbyterianism of every city in America, a board of experts, who may be able to inform the churches with respect to the aims of organized labor, and to inform the workingmen concerning the mission of the church.

These committees shall also assist in the already successfully inaugurated plan of securing for the churches fraternal relationships with workingmen in their organizations; become responsible for the distribution of the literature issued by the board, both for the membership of the church and for the great mass of workingmen outside of the church, and to push aggressively whatever methods may bring about a more cordial relationship between the church and labor.

The above resolutions are now being mailed to the various local and international unions by Charles Stelzle, superintendent of the new department thus created. A request is made that labor papers favor Mr. Stelzle with copies.

THE JOURNAL wishes it distinctly understood that it welcomes the co-operation of the church in all matters affecting the interest of the man who works. It believes a great deal of good can come out of such co-operation, and that a better understanding between the two branches of society is desirable.

The fact that the circular from the new department of the Presbyterian Church does not bear the label of our craft brings to mind a subject that has been often discussed and commented upon. Most of the great religious bodies of this country do their own printing, and in many cases union labor is employed. In a number of instances, however, their printing departments are notoriously non-union, and low wages prevail.

We repeat that we welcome the co-operation of the church, but respectfully suggest that a more friendly feeling, conducive to real co-operation, would be brought about, if all religious bodies would show their earnestness in a practical way by insisting upon the employment of union labor and the payment of decent wages to their employes.

The Way They Feel in Colorado.

The following from the Silverton (Colo.) Standard is too good to boil down—the editor of THE JOURNAL gives the article in its entirety:

The United Typothetæ of America is an organization of employing printers, formed some years ago for the express purpose of fighting the International Typographical Union. From the first it posed as an ultra high-toned outfit, and its membership was confined to the large cities, where, with its ponderous respectability (God help the mark), it sought to dominate and tyrannize over the union printers. Its fight against the International Typographical Union has been unjust from the very start, in consequence of which the typothetæ has lost every battle it has fought with the union printers, and has been outgeneraled and whipped to a standstill in every controversy.

The United Typothetæ is now indulging in a nerve-racking conniption fit over the fact that on the first of next January the union printers all over the country are going to inaugurate an eight-hour workday. The typothetæ has just awakened to the hard-boiled fact that it has been far too exclusive in the past, and that its kid-glove membership needs help, and needs it badly and quickly, too. In view of this dire necessity, the United Typothetæ is sending out to the country employing printers a circular letter, accompanied by a mess of tommy-rot about what an unholy set the union printers are, not failing to run in that old antediluvian chestnut about "running your own business," and winding up with a desperate appeal for the country employer's application for membership in the typothetæ, his moral support and—$10. All of this performance looks very much like the typothetæ realized it had bitten off more than it could chew, and, as a last resort, appeals to the country employers to be "good fellows," and jump in and help it fight its battles. No possible good can come to the country publisher by joining this organization, and so far as the Standard is concerned the United Typothetæ will have to struggle along without our game, influence, and especially our $10.

This frantic appeal of the typothetæ may touch the hearts and pocketbooks of some of the "Back East" proprietors, in "Bleedin' Kansas," for instance, where they pay a maximum scale of $12 per, and still are not happy, but we opine it will fail to bring home the merchandise in wild and woolly Colorado, especially in the mountains, where printers are drawing the Chicago scale, even in towns where there are no unions.

As far as the union printers are concerned, we must say we have always found them a pretty decent lot of craftsmen. They have never attempted to "run our business," nor have they ever been unreasonable in the settlement of any little difficulty that has arisen. We have never had any dealing with non-union prints, and we are too old to switch now. The union boys are good enough for us; we know them thoroughly—in fact, we are of them, and both proprietors of the Standard carry International Typographical Union cards in their inside pockets.

That the typographical union will establish and maintain an eight-hour workday there is no doubt. The organization is ably officered and amply financed for the coming struggle, and while the employing printers, through the typothetæ, may bluster, bluff and bulldoze, they will finally come in and be good or shut up shop, for there are not one-tenth enough competent "rat" printers in the country to supply the demand for men should the union printers go out. The coming contest will be a hot one, but the International Typographical Union people will win out and get their eight-hour day. It is so written.

Ordinarily, the country employing printer has troubles enough of his own, without going out of the way to help some other fellow of whom he knows nothing. The country brethren will best subserve their own interests by keeping well out of this typothetæ outfit, and when its literature arrives place it gently but firmly in the stove, where it may once more resolve itself into what it really consists of—hot air.

THE MICHIGAN TRADESMAN, published at Grand Rapids, and "devoted to the best interests of business men," hands organized labor the following:

Unionism is the same the world over. The moment a man joins a union he leaves honor behind and becomes a lawbreaker, a social outcast, a liar, a thief and a murderer.

It looks as though the fool killer had overlooked a bet.

Speak Up.

In commenting on a recent incident that took place in typographical circles in the city of St. Louis, the Progressive Printer of that city says:

It is a sheer waste of time and white space to enter into physical or scientific arguments or demonstrations why men should not be asked to work more than eight hours per day, or why they should not be willing to work nine hours.

Now, what is the use of being so bashful? Speak right out. We should be pleased to consider some of these "physical or scientific arguments or demonstrations." We have been patiently waiting these many moons for a few arguments against the shorter workday, and here at last comes a man who intimates he has arguments galore, but refuses to reveal them. Don't hide your light under a bushel, Mr. Editor, for if you have the goods you can command your own price from the typothetæ. It is obviously in need of a few "arguments" just now. And you do not deign to deal simply in common arguments. No, indeed! You have "physical and scientific arguments and demonstrations."

Ministerial Fraternal Delegates.

Some time ago the Rev. Edgar P. Hill, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Portland, Ore., was delegated by the ministerial association of the city to represent that body in the federated trades council. In a recent statement the reverend gentleman reviews his impressions and experiences since he has been an attendant at the meetings of the labor body, and a few extracts from his remarks are given below:

These three months have given me some of the richest experiences of my ministry. It has been at no little sacrifice that I have been able to attend every meeting for three months. But I wanted the men to know that I appreciated the honor and valued the privilege of being with them. I have not preached to them. I have not tried to get them to come to my church. I have not posed in print as a "friend of the laboring men." I have simply gone to the council as a delegate to help in any possible way. I have not even thought it necessary to remind the council that I represented the churches or the ministerial association. They, of course, understand that. I did say something on the subject of religion a few weeks ago. It was at a banquet which I had arranged. They asked me to give one of the addresses. I tried to give them some idea of the service the church could render their cause. They are demanding justice, not charity. Every true minister is urging this every Sabbath. They are emphasizing the brotherhood of man. This is the commonest theme of the pulpit. They are struggling for what they conceive to be their rights as to property and leisure. We are eager to give them our help. And it is our mission also to remind them that they have souls as well as bodies, that there is a God and that heaven is just beyond.

I have found the labor leaders here intelligent, fair-minded and dead in earnest. The ministerial delegate who will go to them with a modest, genuine desire to help, will get from them more than he can give.

Help to Make It Unanimous.

The following resolutions were adopted at the recent meeting of the Virginia Federation of Labor:

Whereas, The International Typographical Union has declared for an eight-hour workday, to take effect on January 1, 1906; and,

Whereas, The demand is in keeping with the advancement of an enlightened age, and in the interest of a large and influential body of citizens of our country and the demands of equity, in that it brings to a large body of workmen a much-needed shortening of a day's work which has for years been regarded as too long; therefore,

Resolved, That the Virginia State Federation of Labor, in regular session assembled in the city of Newport News, Va., congratulates the International Typographical Union on the stand it has taken for a shorter workday, and it pledges it all the support, moral and financial, that the combined labor organizations of the state can render, and holds itself in readiness to render any service possible in furtherance of the stand the International Typographical Union has taken.

Resolved, That this preamble and resolution be spread on our minutes and a copy forwarded to the secretary-treasurer of the International Typographical Union.

The following resolution was passed by the recent convention of the Wisconsin State Federation of Labor:

Resolved, That the Wisconsin State Federation of Labor, in convention assembled, hereby pledges its moral and financial support to the Printers' International Typographical Union in their struggle for the eight-hour working day.

The New Jersey State Federation of Labor passed the following at its recent session:

Whereas, The International Typographical Union, in fiftieth annual convention assembled, at St. Louis, Mo., August 8–13, 1904, requested a conference with the National Typothetæ looking to the inauguration of an eight-hour day for the book and job printers; and,

Whereas, The typographical convention, after the typothetæ had refused to consider any overtures toward that end, adopted a resolution to submit to the referendum whether or not, on January 1, 1906, a demand should be made for an eight-hour day; and,

Whereas, The referendum vote resulted in an overwhelming majority for the eight-hour day, and as a result on January 1, 1906, the eight-hour day will be demanded in every book and job office under the jurisdiction of the International Typographical Union, where no contract containing other stipulations exists; and,

Whereas, The American Federation of Labor has unanimously endorsed the action of the International Typographical Union in its demands, and pledged an assessment on the membership in the event of trouble; and,

Whereas, The International Typographical Union, in fifty-first annual convention assembled, at Toronto, Canada, August 14-19, 1905, unanimously endorsed the action taken at St. Louis, and expressed its determination to abide by the decision of the membership as shown by the referendum vote; therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the delegates to the twenty-seventh annual convention of the New Jersey State Federation of Labor, endorse the action of the International Typographical Union in its just demands for the eight-hour day, and pledge to it our every support; and, be it further

Resolved, That we endorse the action of the American Federation of Labor in levying an assessment to assist the International Typographical Union, and pledge to the typographical unions of the state of New Jersey our moral and financial support, and assure them that should such support be desired it will be forthcoming liberally and promptly; and, be it further

Resolved, That in view of the great importance of this eight-hour movement, and the far-reaching effect it will undoubtedly have on other trades, the executive committee of the New Jersey State Federation of Labor is hereby instructed to cooperate with the state eight-hour committee of the printers, and use every means within its power to assist local typographical unions wherever any difficulty may be encountered in securing the shorter workday.

To Buy Up Weak-Kneed Members.

The following is taken from the columns of the Michigan Union Advocate, of Detroit, Mich., a paper that is a real power for the advancement of the interests of organized labor in that state:

It has been suspected by members of Typographical Union No. 18, that the National Manufacturers' Association was assisting the United Typothetæ of America in its unholy war on the union printers of Detroit, and the Michigan Union Advocate herewith presents irrefutable proof that these suspicions are founded on fact.

The proof consists of a telegram signed by President Ellis, of the United Typothetæ of America. That telegram was sent to a member of the local typothetæ and a copy of the telegram was secured by the Michigan Union Advocate. For obvious reasons, the name of the party receiving the telegram can not be divulged. The telegram is as follows:

TORONTO, August 16, —.

———, Detroit, Mich.:

Can do nothing with members of convention. They are all crazy on eight-hour question. Will leave tomorrow. Have wired the treasurer to forward your body $45,000. Will send more as needed. Have just received telegram from executive council of the National Manufacturers' Association stating that they would hereafter stand for one-half our expenses, provided other labor unions can be embroiled in this trouble in your city. Can this be done? An itemized account of all your expenditures must be kept for submission to the National Manufacturers' Association. Break the ranks of striking job men by buying up some of the weak-kneed members. There are always such in every union. Write fully. ELLIS.

Read the foregoing carefully.

Should Be Judged Alike.

In a recent issue of the American Federationist, Samuel Gompers has the following to say:

Some irresponsible workman may, perhaps under the influence of liquor or frenzied with wrong, either real or imagined, shoot off a pistol in the city of Chicago and its echo is heard reverberating throughout the entire continent and the world, and under the din and noise and increasing volume of denunciation, the shot silences the work of a quarter of a century of the efforts of organized labor in taking children from the workshops and the mills and the mines, and placing them in the school rooms, the play grounds, and the fields where they may have the sunshine and grow and develop materially, mentally, physically, and morally. The shorter workday for the men and women, the girls and boys; the larger measure and better opportunity secured for the great mass of people by organized labor; the thousand and one material improvements, are all hushed by the one sound of a pistol shot, and the work of organized labor and the achievements for a larger and broader conception of humane conditions of our fellows and the better regard for the rights of all, are entirely lost sight of.

Why should labor be held more strictly to account than is capital or other branches of the social structure? Defalcations of "prominent" bankers, exposures of nefarious financial deals in the magazines, details of colossal graft in the government departments, and of scandals in the religious world—all these are read, mildly commented upon and forgotten. But the same papers and magazines that are so willing to forget all these instances of rottenness never tire of recalling the name of Sam Parks, and seldom let an opportunity pass to present him as a representative labor leader. Why should there be two standards of morality—one for labor and one for the sacred "business interests"? Why should not the acts of one body of men be judged in the same light as the other? We know we are not perfect; we know that dishonest men sometimes get into the unions; but why should our defects, trivial in comparison, be constantly proclaimed to the world, while the erring banker, preacher, business man or government employe is the recipient of columns of slush extenuating his crime?

The Direction of the Wind.

The following leading editorial from the Aitkin (Minn.) Republican is but one of the many straws that indicate which way the wind is blowing:

THE TYPOTHETAE AND THE TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION.

The International Typographical Union has set January 1, next, as the time for asking a shorter workday throughout the country, and the big employing printers, organized into the typothetæ, are sending out circulars to the country papers setting out the grave dangers of union domination and making a stirring appeal to the rural journalists to join the typothetæ for mutual protection.

The cry of union domination has no terrors for the average country newspaper. The scale of wages in the country, although less than in cities, is satisfactory and the work and hours are not such as to make the average journeyman printer pine for a change. The relations in the country between employer and employe are generally cordial, and there is no prospect of there being any change. It is not the union that the country paper needs to be protected against, but the typothetæ. That organization has an agreement to keep up the prices of job printing in the cities, and the bids on the state printing, recently opened, show that the agreement is being adhered to and that the bids are nearly 100 per cent higher than has been paid for the work before. But this is neither here nor there. The point we wish to emphasize is that this agreement doesn't hold outside of the cities; for while employing printers require the home people to pay a good price for their work, many of them solicit the work of the country business men and offer to do it at any old price, so long as it covers cost. This procedure is an injury to the country newspapers, and we don't believe any of them will be soft enough to join with the city people in making war on the typographical union. The editor of this great family journal knows something about the typographical union. The union's leadership has always been characterized by intelligence and conservatism, and although we haven't been affiliated actively with the boys for some years, and do not know much about the prospective struggle, we are satisfied that any demands made for a shorter day will be reasonable and such as will merit the approval of public opinion, without which no fight can be won in this country.

Take him off of your mail list, Mr. Macintyre. It will serve him right.

Eight-Hour Day a Success.

Alfred T. Dolge, a shoe manufacturer of Dolgeville, Cal., has the following to say in regard to the success of the shorter workday in the operation of his factory:

I believe that ten or even nine hours makes too long a day for any shoeworker to do his best work. Most of the poor work done in factories is the result of too long hours. Late in the afternoon both men and women, weary of the monotonous motions they are obliged to go through, and without realizing it, become careless. The result is defects in shoes, which are rarely found in work that is done during the early part of the day. To overcome this we tried the eight-hour day, and noted immediate improvement. But I was not quite satisfied even then, and instituted a ten-minute recess during the middle of the forenoon and the middle of the afternoon.

This, of course, cuts twenty minutes out of the already short eight-hour day, but it has proven a great success. More shoes are turned out in my factory during the seven hours and forty minutes of labor than were ever made before during ten hours of continuous work. And not only this, but there is no longer any trouble about poor workmanship.

Mr. Ellis Denies the Statement.

Appearing before the Toronto convention, President George H. Ellis, of the United Typothetæ of America, took occasion to say:

In the last number of THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL is a report of a meeting of employing printers, held a short time since in Milwaukee, in which I am credited with the following: "Mr. Ellis said it was a crime against the constitution to make a contract with organized labor. It was detrimental to the willing non-union workers and tended to deprive them of making a living. That he hoped he would never be under obligation to sign any agreement in the future." This is absolutely and unequivocally false, and such meaning could not be twisted out of anything that I said. To those of you who know me I hardly need to say that I not only said no such thing, but that I hold no such views.

The Milwaukee meeting referred to by President Ellis was reported for THE JOURNAL by a Chicago employer of reliability.

In view of the statement made by Mr. Ellis, however, THE JOURNAL readily accedes to his contention that the wrong construction was placed upon his remarks. This magazine is indeed pleased to learn that the president of the United Typothetæ does not believe that it is a crime against the constitution to make a contract with organized labor, or that such a contract is detrimental to the willing non-union workers and tends to deprive them of making a living. As to the future, we trust that the typothetæ will be ready for an agreement, even without obligation.

IN one of his latest "follow-up" circulars to the employers of the country, John Macintyre asks the following question:

> Have you found time to examine the literature sent by us to show you how vitally essential it is for you to join the U. T. A. and how impossible it is for single shop owners to successfully fight organized labor?

Thank you for the point, Mr. Macintyre. We will now ask the unorganized printers of the country if they realize how impossible it is for them to successfully fight organized capital?

THE TAILOR, the official organ of the Journeymen Tailors' Union of America, in a leading editorial in its last issue, after reviewing the eight-hour movement of our union, concludes as follows: "We extend to the printers our very best wishes and have no hesitation in assuring them that any support that can be extended to them by the Journeymen Tailors' Union of America will be extended freely and promptly whenever it can be of benefit." Thanks.

THERE are sixty-five printing establishments in the city of Indianapolis. Ten of these are members of the typothetæ—or about 15 per cent. A liberal estimate gives the number of printers in that city as five hundred. Four hundred and sixty of them are members of the typographical union—or about 92 per cent.

THERE is at the present time a wide difference between trade unionism and Western Union-ism.

Refuse to Do the Dirty Work.

The Little Falls (Minn.) Transcript has the following to say anent the efforts of the United Typothetæ of America to hand the country proprietors a gold brick:

> We see no reason why the country printers of Minnesota should go out of their way to assist the large printing concerns of the state in the struggle with their employes over the eight-hour day. The large concerns never hesitate about invading local territory, cutting prices and making conditions difficult for the smaller concerns, and it is simply impudence on their part to ask assistance from those who never received assistance from them. Besides, the sympathy of most of the country press is with the employes.

And the Murdock Voice, of the same state, adds its mite as follows:

> The typothetæ is today not only cutting prices in the cities, but has already entered the field that naturally belongs to the country printer, and is cutting the prices so that no country printer can compete.
> While we are not a member of either organization and do not desire to become one, we must in justice to all concerned hope that the union wins its fight for an eight-hour day.

Child Labor Legislation.

The following are extracts from an address delivered by O. R. Lovejoy, assistant secretary of the national child labor committee, at the recent annual convention of factory inspectors held in Detroit, Mich.:

> All these duties of the factory inspector, to criticize laws, to investigate conditions and to interpret information, have for their purpose the enforcement of law. But this does not relieve the private citizen of obligation. Ours has been called "a government by complaint." All legislation is the direct result of concentrated influence brought to bear upon lawmakers. Naturally the interests directly affected are first to present their claims, and representatives of various industries are always at hand to oppose restriction of night work, the raising of age limits, and other child labor legislation, one cotton manufacturer recently even asserting that the machinery of his industry is especially constructed to accommodate the height of children ten and twelve years old.
> But who will present the cause of the army of toiling children? Who will array the pale faces and crippled limbs and hollow chests and dwarfed intellects and moral fatigue of these little laborers to plead for them? Who will show that this army is a menace not only to itself, but to society? Who will demonstrate that one of the greatest forces lying at the root of the "labor problem" is this inarticulate juvenile army which a shortsighted industrial economy keeps on hand as raw material to force the labor market? These children are not conscious of their need and are most frequently arrayed against any effort to emancipate them. To expect a few inspectors to plead alone a cause which is the concern of all society is a cowardly shirking of responsibility which can not be indulged without the atrophy of the social conscience. The greatest menace to our democracy is delegated responsibility.

Digitized by Google

We commend the foregoing to the consideration of C. W. Post, D. M. Parry and other representatives of the "business interests."

Some Constitutional Provisions.

The following editorial was recently printed in the Hearst papers, and is rather to the point, in view of several decisions handed down by judges in the last few months:

One of our judges declares that labor unions have the right to place pickets about a plant where a strike is in progress. He also declares that workmen have the right to persuade other workmen to quit.

It is rather strange that any judge should be called upon to give a decision of this kind, since the request for such a decision simply questions the authority and legality of the constitution of the United States.

The constitution of the United States says that no law shall be made prohibiting "the right of the people peaceably to assemble."

This section of the constitution gives men the right to gather where they please peaceably, either as pickets, as Salvation Army people or otherwise.

The constitution of the United States says further: "Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press."

This clause in the constitution gives men the right to talk to one another without interference, and this involves the right of one workman to persuade another to stop work, if he can persuade him peaceably by argument.

Unless the constitution of the United States is a joke there ought to be no further need of judges to decide that men in the United States have the right to talk with one another and walk with one another.

As this newspaper has stated before, any judicial interference with the right of free speech is a direct invitation to violence, which throughout history has always been the alternative of free speech.

The individual, be he judge or other, who interferes with free speech encourages violence and is a dangerous citizen.

SEND 50 cents to the International secretary-treasurer and get a "badge of servitude."

AS MARK HANNA would have put it, the convention "stood pat."

THE second meeting of the Northern Ohio Eight-Hour Conference was held at Canton, Sunday, July 30, and was better attended than the Akron session a month ago. There were about forty delegates and members present from Alliance, Akron, Cleveland, Coshocton, Canton, Massillon and Salem. Unions in quite a number of other cities sent greetings and hoped to send delegates to the next meeting, which was held the last Sunday in August. The temporary organization was made permanent, Max S. Hayes being elected chairman, and Ed Herne, of Akron, secretary-treasurer. The general situation was gone over in detail, and every city reported that sentiment favorable to the eight-hour day was unanimous and that every effort is being made to organize the country printer. Canton Union provided the delegates with a wholesome lunch, and was voted thanks for its entertainment.

MAX HAYES, in his paper, the Cleveland Citizen, says:

We notice that a number of our exchanges are quite indignant because some of their 'steemed contemporaries are pirating their editorials without credit. There is probably reason for the objections raised. No labor paper editor is fond of racking his brains for the benefit of a lot of scissors manipulators who are too lazy to furnish ideas for the benefit of the working class, and then frequently find that those same plagiarists are receiving credit for his articles. The Citizen is tempted to offer a number of labor papers not a million miles from Cleveland the use of its "mats," so that their tired editors will not even be compelled to wield the heavy scissors.

What We Are Doing

Eight Hours is one of the provisions of the scale just signed by the Courier of Bristol, Tenn. The recording secretary of Bristol Union No. 426, Mr. Galyon, writes THE JOURNAL that prospects are bright for the complete victory of the eight-hour day.

* * *

Eight Hours is provided for in the scale signed on July 27 by Sharon (Pa.) Union No. 351 with all the proprietors in the city. Secretary Crone, of that union, writes THE JOURNAL that there was no trouble experienced in obtaining the signatures of the proprietors.

* * *

Eight Hours per day is the basis on which the Barnsdall Printing Company, of Bradford, Pa., began running on August 1. The secretary of Bradford Union writes THE JOURNAL that every printer in that city is a member of No. 185, and that the shorter workday will be secured in all offices.

* * *

Eight Hours is included in the contract (for three years) just signed by the firm of Page & McCammon with El Paso (Texas) Union No. 370. This makes two first-class union job offices for El Paso—Page & McCammon and Rood & Van Loon. Both contracts provide for the eight-hour day.

* * *

Eight Hours is the basis on which the Bauerfeind Press of San Antonio, Texas, is conducting its job department—composing room, press room and bindery. Their business is said to be rapidly increasing, and they are competing successfully with the nine-hour shops and getting the business. They recently found it necessary to increase their force.

* * *

Eight Hours is provided for in the contracts just signed with the News Publishing Company, T. B. Blair and the Neenah Times by Appleton, Neenah and Menasha (Wis.) Typographical Union No. 612. The contracts run until July 1, 1907. The local secretary states that every effort will be made to secure similar contracts with all of the other offices under the jurisdiction of No. 612, and that there is favorable prospect of success.

* * *

A NEW scale was just signed by St. John (N. B.) Union No. 85 that provides for a 20 per cent increase over the old one. The scale went into effect on August 1, when every shop granted the increase without protest.

Violence You Don't Read About.

You often hear people say they believe in unions and would give their support to the labor movement if it were not for the "violence" connected with the trade union movement. This idea of violence they get from the daily press accounts of strikes in large cities, where mobs of irresponsible rowdies and thugs congregate during labor troubles and improve the opportunity to get even with the police. It is conceded by fair-minded men that not one-tenth of the violence connected with strikes is attributable to the strikers. Mr. August Belmont recently made the statement that, in justice to the labor unions, he wished to say that of the score of men arrested for rioting in connection with the recent interborough strike in the city of New York, not a single one was a member of the street railway employes' union. The press of the country is quick to seize on and magnify any incident that can possibly be construed into a story of violence on the part of the unions. On the other hand, do you ever see such heads as these in the daily papers: "Fifty Women Died of Hunger as a Result of Starvation Wages in New York Sweatshops," or "One Hundred Girls Driven to Suicide This Year Because of Low Wages in Department Stores," or "A Hundred Children Murdered by the Cotton Mills of the South." No, you never see such heads in the newspapers, but all the same this sort of violence is going on all the time—violence sanctioned by the sacred "business interests." If you kill a man you commit murder, it matters not whether you do it with a club or by the kid-glove method preferred by the "business interests."

IT is about time for the regular quarterly holdup of the publishers by C. W. Post. "We are advertised by our loving friends."

President's Paragraphs

SECTION 131, GENERAL LAWS.

No local union shall sign a contract guaranteeing its members to work for any proprietor, firm or corporation, unless such contract is in accordance with International law and approved by the International President.

THE TORONTO CONVENTION.

More than fifteen hundred delegates and visitors attended the fifty-first convention. This unprecedented gathering of printers and their friends was distinctly an eight-hour conclave. Other matters of importance were before the convention, and these were passed on by the delegates, but all of the attendants took part in the eight-hour proceedings. They were in Toronto in the interest of the eight-hour movement, and they proposed to be heard. Eight-hour badges, eight-hour cards and eight-hour sentiment identified eight-hour advocates, and there was no minority. All were for eight hours. As one delegate's card expressed it, "Eight hours for work, eight hours for sleep, eight hours for," and then followed owner's name. When the report of the convention eight-hour committee came up for action, and was adopted unanimously the ovation was continuous and inspiring. The convention adjourned on Saturday with three cheers and a tiger for the eight-hour day, after it was ordained that the official battle cry should be: "We propose to sell to the employer eight hours out of twenty-four, and we will do as we please with the remaining sixteen."

PRIOR TO THE TORONTO CONVENTION.

All of the documents and data in possession of the International committee were placed before the convention committee on eight-hour day, including the letter announcing the position taken at its last year's convention by the United Typothetæ. This letter follows:

St. Louis, June 23, 1904.

Messrs. Lynch, Bramwood and Miller, Committee from International Typographical Union:

Gentlemen—In accordance with your request, expressed in the conference yesterday, that we should obtain from the convention a statement of its attitude upon the proposed eight-hour day, we placed the matter before the convention, and also the telegram addressed to you from Indianapolis, and beg to submit in reply thereto the following resolutions, which passed unanimously:

Whereas, The International Typographical Union has asked the United Typothetæ of America to declare its position upon the proposed eight-hour day; and,

Whereas, Under existing conditions any attempt to reduce the hours of labor in the printing trade would be disastrous to the employer and employe alike; be it

Resolved, That the United Typothetæ of America declares that it is opposed to any reduction of the fifty-four-hour week; and, be it further

Resolved, That the United Typothetæ of America will resist any attempt on the part of the International Typographical Union to reduce the present hours of labor. Yours very truly,

William Green,
George H. Ellis,
Harry P. Pears,
Thomas E. Donnelley,
F. C. Nunemacher.

After full consideration of the data and documents alluded to, the committee's conclusion was: "From the foregoing review of the procedure and documents in the eight-hour campaign, it becomes at once evident that the International Typographical Union has, from the inception of the idea, held itself in readiness to confer with the United Typothetæ of America, to the end that a peaceful settlement of the demand involved might be reached and that there might be the minimum disturbance of the conditions prevailing in the printing trade. It is also apparent that the United Typothetæ, on the other hand, has steadfastly opposed any reduction of the fifty-four-hour week, and has on every occasion, through its officers, circulars and public press, made known that opposition. As far as your committee is aware, the typothetæ has never modified the position taken at its St. Louis convention, and, while its officers have seemingly been willing to confer, they have avoided acceptance of opportunities for conference, and at the employers' mass meetings they have uniformly advised aggressive resistance and warfare if necessary in order to prevent the general introduction of the eight-hour workday. If, therefore, trouble does occur, the typothetæ will be alone responsible for the rupture of present relations."

THE TYPOTHETAE CONFERS IN TORONTO.

The president of the United Typothetæ of America, together with the organization's secretary and three members of the executive committee, were at the convention, responding to an invitation from the executive council to attend, and conferred with the convention eight-hour committee. Later the typothetæ representatives embodied their views in a letter to the committee's chairman, which was made a part of the full report. In this letter "The committee from the United Typothetæ of America suggest to the eight-hour committee from the International Typographical Union that they recommend to the International Typographical Union convention, now in session, that it vote in favor of a reconsideration of the referendum vote taken last fall on the eight-hour day, and authorize a new referendum vote to be taken with the object of rescinding the resolution to make the eight-hour day effective January 1, 1906; or if the convention is unwilling to vote affirmatively on the above, that the convention shall empower the executive council to call for such referendum vote if at any time between now and January 1, 1906, the executive council shall consider it advisable." Immediately following the reading of the foregoing, the typothetæ president addressed the convention. The speech appears in full in the proceedings. After reciting opposition to the eight-hour day, this summary is given: "The situation then narrows itself down to the following: If you insist upon the eight-hour day the printers of America must fight you. We have no idea that in every place we will be successful, but we are confident that in the majority of cases we will win and that the present relationship between your Union and the United Typothetæ of America will be broken up—a relationship which has been to the benefit of both parties—and that, from now on, throughout this country most of the large book and job offices will operate in disregard of your organization, if not in hostile opposition to it."

Digitized by Google

THE CONVENTION'S ACTION.

The report of the committee on eight-hour day, adopted unanimously by the convention, among other declarations, said: "As to the action that shall be taken by this convention, your committee is of the opinion that any change in the present program would of necessity have to be referred to the referendum. The eight-hour proposition endorsed by the referendum provides: 'That on January 1, 1906, the eight-hour day shall become effective in all union establishments in the jurisdiction of the International Typographical Union, where existing contracts do not prevent, and in each instance where the eight-hour day is refused work shall cease.' There is no room for doubt as to the meaning of this provision. If an agreement between the International Typographical Union and the United Typothetæ of America is not reached prior to January 1, 1906, and if resistance to the introduction of the shorter workday is met with on that date, it devolves on all the members of the International Typographical Union working in union establishments that decline to accede to the eight-hour day to at once cease work. In other words, and in order that there may be no misunderstanding as to the position of the International Typographical Union, no union printer can, after January 1, work in a union office more than eight hours per day, forty-eight hours per week, except in emergency and under overtime rates. We believe that this convention should clothe the International eight-hour committee with power to negotiate with representatives of the United Typothetæ of America if opportunity for negotiation occurs prior to January 1, and we so recommend, in order that the declaration of the referendum 'That we again declare our entire willingness to negotiate with the United Typothetæ of America for an agreement under which the eight-hour day will become operative, and so instruct our eight-hour committee,' may not be impaired. We further recommend that the executive council be empowered to protect unions, where the local or national typothetæ precipitate trouble, by requesting unions in contiguous territory to order strikes whenever the council may deem necessary for the protection of the unions involved.

NO DISCRIMINATION; EIGHT HOURS FOR ALL.

"We find that it is the apparent intention in some localities where job offices are owned by publishers of newspapers, to grant the eight-hour day in the newspaper department but not in the job department; therefore your committee would recommend that, where a newspaper and job office is being conducted at present by the same individual, firm or corporation, on a nine-hour basis, no settlement for the eight-hour day shall be made, that does not provide that it shall become effective in both departments. We urge the delegates attending this convention, on their return to their unions, to at once bring this report before these bodies; to urge upon their unions the value of organization work by the appointment of special committees to forward such purpose whenever necessary, and also ask these unions to provide, if action has not already been taken, for the collection of a fund, in addition to that accruing under the one-half of one per cent assessment, so that on January 1 every gap may be closed and ammunition gathered with which to conduct warfare, if warfare is necessary. Your committee, after thoroughly considering all of the facts recited in this report, after carefully scrutinizing all of the documents issued in connection with the eight-hour campaign, after interviewing the International officers and delegates to this convention, after in every way familiarizing itself with the vast subject submitted to it for consideration, finds not a single flaw in the methods and policy that have thus far been pursued by the International eight-hour committee, and we recommend that the continuance of the campaign and the further steps that are to be taken in order to secure the shorter workday be again committed to the International committee, with assurances of the full confidence of the delegates to the fifty-first session of the International Typographical Union."

AT ONCE AN INSPIRATION AND A LESSON.

In speaking to the motion to adopt the report of the committee, and also in answer to the address of the president of the typothetæ, the committee's chairman expressed well the prevailing sentiment, and thus concluded a masterly address: "In conclusion I wish to emphasize the fact that the International Typographical Union and other trade unions, in making the reduction of the hours of labor the paramount issue, are striving to realize one of the most far-reaching and noblest missions ever undertaken by any organization. We are endeavoring to open opportunities to all the people; not a few. The eight-hour day means not less wages, but more wages; it means the absorption of the unemployed army of workers and the increasing demand for labor as well as minimizing of the present fierce, cut-throat competition. The eight-hour day means the creating of new hopes, desires and aspirations among our class—a nobler manhood and a happier womanhood and childhood. The eight-hour day means that those now employed would be less exhausted after a day's toil; that mental and physical resources would be fostered and developed and life and health prolonged. The eight-hour day means stronger family ties, pleasant homes, more time for good books, to attend lectures, to cultivate music, art and science, and for the study of all the glories lavished upon mankind by generous Mother Nature. The eight-hour day means that poverty would be decreased, sweatshops would be wiped out, drunkenness, prostitution, crime and misery would be greatly reduced; it means that wealth would be more equitably distributed, enlightenment disseminated, invention and discovery stimulated, and a greater and grander progress would bless the world than mankind has yet known. This is the glorious ideal for which the organized workers are struggling, and they deserve the sympathy and support of all true men and women."

Digitized by Google

ORGANIZATION RECOMMENDED.

"We especially endorse the idea of thoroughly organizing the so-called country printers," says the report of the eight-hour committee, "and we urge it on the membership so that on January 1, 1906, the jurisdiction may be thoroughly organized and our International union in condition to meet any warfare that may be forced upon it by employers resisting the general introduction of the shorter workday. In this matter of organization we may well take a lesson out of the book of the typothetæ. For the past year they have strenuously made effort to bring within their ranks publishers of country newspapers, whom they had previously not only studiously ignored, but into whose job printing patronage they had continuously made sad inroads. They have succeeded in some instances by reducing their admission fees, but this bait has always failed with the country editor who fails to understand why he should lend himself to pull typothetæ chestnuts from the fire. However, it is our duty in this emergency to organize the country printers, and where they are not numerous enough in a town to obtain a charter they can, with little persuasion and by generous inducements, be prevailed upon to assume membership in unions contiguous to their respective towns. To this end your committee would suggest that they be permitted to affiliate with the local unions of their choice nearest their towns of residence. This plan is already in successful operation in some places, and we recommend the project to all the local unions in the International jurisdiction." And the committee on organization thus expressed itself: "Considering the work of organization as a whole, during the past year we, your committee, believe that thousands of dollars in strike benefits have been saved to the International Typographical Union through the good work of its organizers. And further recognizing the great importance of this work just prior to the enforcement of the eight-hour workday, we would recommend that the executive council be authorized to further the work of organization to its fullest extent, commensurate with the funds at its disposal. Your committee would also recommend and insist that all subordinate unions use their best endeavors to organize their immediate surrounding territory."

ANOTHER COMMITTEE ENDORSES EIGHT HOURS.

The committee on officers' reports added its quota to the eight-hour testimony and determination. This passage is from that committee's report, also adopted unanimously by the convention: "We know that that portion of the president's report reviewing the campaign for the eight-hour day has been referred to the eight-hour committee, but we take the liberty, nevertheless, to express herein our endorsement of the methods that have thus far been pursued and our commendation of the wisdom that has marked the struggle. In common with more than 47,000 of our fellow workmen, we look forward with conviction to the inauguration, peaceably we hope, of the eight-hour day on January 1, and we believe that such a consummation will place the International Typographical Union in the forefront of all the labor organizations of the world. It is true that we have been backward in accomplishing this great reform at present enjoyed by so many wage workers in other trades, but circumstances must always guide in policy pursued, and we feel that the International Typographical Union might not have been justified in sooner seeking to shorten the workday. With the introduction of machinery and improvements making for economy in effort in many other directions, we can now assert that the time for the eight-hour day is here, and that we are amply justified in pressing forward to its realization."

IT WAS AN EIGHT-HOUR GATHERING.

The six-day law was changed to read "Not more than forty-eight hours shall constitute a week's work." The executive council was also authorized to make such corrections in existing law as may be necessary to conformance with the eight-hour principle, after January 1, 1906.

From the brief summary and excerpts given in this department, a partial idea of the "eight-hour" convention may be gained; it is believed that the desire of the membership was reflected.

The report of the eight-hour committee was ordered printed and circulated among the members. When received, it should be carefully read.

And it all goes to show that we are determined to win, and

We will win, because we are right.

San Antonio, Detroit and Chicago are now bearing the brunt of eight-hour opposition. The employers in these cities, or rather those making up the local typothetæ, decided that they would not wait until January 1, and so courted the present warfare. The Detroit difficulty is now three weeks old, and but twenty-five incompetents, sailing under the assumption that they are strike-breaking printers, have been secured to take the places of one hundred and twenty-five union printers. In San Antonio a few non-unionists were in cold-storage ready to do the employers' bidding. We do not know how many "free and independent" travesties the Chicago typothetæ have in their corral, but at this writing only about a dozen are at work. Watch out, so that you may be prepared to aid the unions now in the trenches.

Woman's Department

WOMAN'S INTERNATIONAL AUXILIARY.

President—Mrs. Ed D. Donnell, 906 West Eighth street, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Secretary—Mrs. C. E. McKee, 430 East Vermont street, Indianapolis, Ind.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

The lawn social at the residence of Mrs. Louis Miller, July 27, was a decided success, socially and financially. The weather was delightful, the music was fine. Cake and ice cream was served, and no pains spared to make the occasion one of enjoyment to all present. The raffle for the quilt, made by the ladies of No. 9, took place at this time, and Typographical Union No. 42, which had some time previous to this bought fifty tickets of us, held the lucky number that drew the quilt.

Regular meeting of Woman's Auxiliary No. 9 was held Thursday evening, August 10, but, owing to the very warm weather, only a few of our ladies were in attendance.

Our delegate, Mrs. John Olson, departed Thursday evening, August 10, for convention at Toronto. She is one of our most energetic workers, and if any one deserves a trip of this kind it is Mrs. Olson. She was twice elected delegate, but owing to insufficient funds in our treasury last year, she was unable to attend, but this year we have been working hard with the determination of sending her.

MRS. FRANK BOREEN,
Secretary.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.

No. 3 was not represented in THE JOURNAL last month, for we thought some other member would enjoy using the space allotted to us, thus giving a variety to our correspondence. But no one ventured, so here we are "bobbing up serenely" again to let you all know that No. 3 is actively engaged in the label business, and that to stay. Two new members have been added to our list lately, Mesdames William Farrin and George R. Allen. And that is only the beginning of what we intend to do this year. Our membership decreased considerably the past year or two, but we hope to more than regain our number. Sisters, "where there's a will, there's a way." Our eight-hour day committee is an assured fact, a living, active reality, having put away every thought but this, "in times of peace prepare for war." The members of No. 23 have very gallantly met them more than half-way in this undertaking and pledged 10 cents for each one's wife or sweetheart who does not belong to Auxiliary No. 3. Two members of the committee, Mesdames Crowley and Fenton, called upon our brethren at their last meeting and received a hearty welcome, thus encouraging us in the work. Nearly every member of No. 3 is wearing the eight-hour day button, and proud to do so for the sake of our husbands and brothers of the craft. Our convention delegate has not had time to report, but from the fine program, we predict every one having a glorious time.

Some label work was reported at the August meeting, and we hope to accomplish much more in the coming months. No. 3 decided to participate in the Labor day parade, and indications are for a good showing.

We held a basket picnic at Lake Park, August 17, and those present enjoyed the day's outing with the refreshing breezes along the beach.

Our attendance the past two months has not been up to the usual number, but we trust, with the cooler weather in view, every one will feel it a duty, as well as a pleasure, to be up and doing, and remember that the second Tuesday of each month is auxiliary day.

Here's best wishes to every auxiliary in existence, hoping our number will be doubled the coming year.

VIRGINIA R. FENTON.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.

A little early No. 21 met this month so as to give our delegate, Mrs. D. B. Barnes, and alternate, Mrs. E. Hale, an opportunity to be with us before leaving for the convention at Toronto.

The meeting was an interesting one, and every member present voted in favor of leaving the per capita tax as it is at the present time, and our delegate was instructed accordingly. We, after giving this subject much thought and consideration, decided that 80 cents a year was a very small sum to spend for a good cause in 365 days; there are very few other things one would spend so little for in a whole year. I, for one, was glad to see all present agree on this important subject, as it is much more pleasant than to disagree, but a more considerate and reasonable organization does not exist in Chattanooga than ours.

Mount City Woman's Auxiliary voted a note of thanks be sent to No. 89 for the pleasant evening we enjoyed at Olympia theater.

Through THE JOURNAL, I see where several of the auxiliaries are not supported by the typographical union; in this they are very unfortunate, and perhaps before the eight-hour arrangement is over they can see where we are of some good. They should remember that no one will stick to them in trouble as a wife, mother and sister. Am delighted to state that No. 89 and No. 21 are the best of friends. The Chattanooga printers are always doing and saying nice things for the auxiliary, and I am sure each and every one appreciates it.

A new member, Mrs. P. Moore, was obligated, and No. 21 welcomes her and hopes to see her cheerful face at all meetings. Mrs. Moore lives at 500 Cherry street, and I am sure she will be glad to see the ladies at her home any old time.

We decided to send Mrs. Woolly flowers—she is a printer's wife, and has been sick ever since they came here. Mesdames Behm, Kemp and Shehe offered flowers from their flower gardens for this purpose. Being present when the flowers were received, Mrs. Woolly asked me to thank No. 21, and especially those who so kindly gave them. Members have made numerous calls to sick rooms, and flowers and fruits have been given by individual members.

The meeting was held at the home of Mrs. J. O'Brien, with the largest attendance since early spring. This pleased her much, but the peach cream and assorted cakes pleased us most. An eight-hour button was found on each slice of angel food; two good things together. This was a favor of No. 89's secretary, Mr. O'Brien, who was present, as also was Mr. Groaner. These gentlemen assisted Mrs. O'Brien, and they filled each dish the second time and no one objected. The room was artistically decorated with ferns and cut flowers, and Mrs. O'Brien proved herself an enviable hostess.

Next meeting will be held with the writer, at 413 Lookout street. I insist on all being present.

MRS. OZA BLODGETT.

LINCOLN, NEB.

In Mrs. Kennedy's report in the Western Laborer some time since she mentioned the fact that the auxiliary known as Capital No. 11, auxiliary to No. 209, was the third largest in the United States. Now we are proud of this record, and are trying to follow Mrs. Kennedy's advice in her August circular letter, in which she says we should increase our membership in order to reduce our per capita tax, for Lincoln is not a very large city nor a very old one, and, of course, has not a large union compared to other cities.

In order to increase our membership and to keep others interested, we give monthly socials, which are usually very well attended, though during the warm weather it is rather hard to get a crowd, but if outsiders come once they nearly always come again.

As our delegates are not back yet from Toronto, I can't give any news, so I will close, hoping that we may have rivals for the third place, though we will try to go higher, or at least to keep that place.

CLARA L. KING.

CHICAGO, ILL.

I have waited until the last minute hoping for some word from Toronto, but I wait in vain. We had a very pleasant day for the delegates going east, and while we did not have many of our auxiliary delegates, there were enough typos to fill the automobiles provided by the ex-delegates, and right here we want to thank the Chicago Ex-Delegates' Association for inviting us to co-operate with them in the entertainment of guests passing through the city on their way to Toronto.

August 19 the members of No. 41, who have remained faithful to Chicago as a summer resort, had an outing on the Wooded Island in Jackson Park; a sumptuous luncheon, music and dancing made the time pass swiftly. A short shower drove the whole party into the Japanese buildings, and only added to the enjoyment. August 25 the ladies will give an informal reception in their hall to all homeward bound from Toronto.

September 8 will be an important meeting, and we hope to see a large attendance, the annual election of officers taking place that night. On the evening of September 13, our first anniversary, Mrs. Charles E. Winter, president, will give the auxiliary a reception at her home. Toward the last of September Mrs. M. R. Feeney will give a lawn fete. In advance of the returning hosts comes William Cruikshank, of St. Louis, a former resident of Chicago, and one who has innumerable friends here.

MRS. GILBERT R. JONES.

ST. LOUIS, MO.

A successful euchre was given July 20 at Delmar Garden. A satisfactory sum was realized.

No. 29 recorded its vote favorably to the present per capita rate.

A considerable number of St. Louis ladies, members of No. 29 and others, attended the Toronto convention.

MRS. J. J. DIRKS.

WHAT MACHINES DO.

In ruling paper, the worker, using quill and ruler, seventy years ago took 4,800 hours to do work now done by a machine in two and three quarters hours. The oldtime workers got $1 a day, now the two men employed earn $7 a day between them, and yet the labor cost of producing a given quantity is 85 cents, against $400. It is easy to understand from this how it is possible to use so much more material and to keep a great army of workers going instead of an individual.

Machinery is now extensively used in boot making, making 100 pairs of men's cheap-grade boots in 154½ hours, against 1,436¾ by hand while the labor cost is reduced from $400 to $35. In women's boots the case is equally marked, for instead of one man being employed to do every thing, there are 140 engaged, each on a different machine operation; but not only is the time taken to 100 boots reduced to less than a tenth what it was, but the cost is also reduced.

Again, in breadmaking, less than a third of the time is now taken. One thousand pounds of dough for biscuits is rolled, cut and prepared for baking in three hours and fifty-four minutes, as against fifty-four hours by hand.—Tobacco Worker.

THE influence of the organizations of the working people through their trade unions upon modern advancement has been most marked. That they have exerted an influence for good, and have remedied abuses of long standing, and materially bettered the conditions of those who toil for livelihood, can not be denied by the most bitter opponents of modern union.—John A. Flett.

We propose to sell to the employer eight hours out of twenty-four, and we will do as we please with the remaining sixteen.—Official battle cry of the International Typographical Union.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Eight hours for work;
Eight hours for sleep;
Eight hours for recreation.
A fair division of time;
A reasonable period for all things;
A sensible reckoning for nature's works.

It would not be out of place if some bright printer would write an epitaph on the United Typothetæ. Whipped in its first skirmish with union printers, its doom is easily reckoned.

The "last ditch" so frequently referred to by orators and writers among the typothetæ membership will be made famous by their falling into it in a running retreat.

The Sudwarth printing office chapel adopted suitable resolutions upon the death of William B. Skelly, one of its members, who died recently.

Naturally the American Federation will exact from the printer who puts out The Federationist that he must conform his office to the eight-hour work day according to the endorsement given the proposition by the convention held at San Francisco. Secretary Morrison will hardly overlook making such a stipulation in the next contract.

President Prescott had a carefully written article in the Inland Printer for August on "Will it be Peace or War." He reviewed both sides of the case in the eight-hour proposition, and his words of caution are worthy of serious consideration, not only by the printer but by the employer as well. Mr. Prescott has always been conservative in matters of all nature, and as he ever has the welfare of the union printer in mind, his suggestions are considered of value by a large element in the international membership.

The report of the officers to the International Typographical Union convention was an exhaustive exposition of current events. President Lynch handled the eight-hour question in a comprehensive and entertaining way. His reference to union matters was expressive and lucid. Secretary Bramwood covered every feature of his office in a manner commendatory and intelligently, while the word from the organizers and Superintendent Deacon is highly explanatory and especially interesting and instructive. These reports should be carefully read by every member of the International.

In that the United Typothetæ failed in an effort to restore the nine-hour day it is unreasonable that a board of arbitration would consent to a reduction in wages on a newspaper in the city of Washington.

To the fault-finder and alleged backcapper let me say that he who can not boost becomes exceedingly stale and unseasonable as a roaster.

In a short while the Post will occupy its new addition, and the time is not far distant when the Times will be issued from its new building. It is the general hope among printers that the increased facilities each paper will secure will have a tendency to increase the size of the newspaper and in that way give more work to the printers. The Post will have three additional machines, while the Times may increase its number to eighteen or twenty. Joyous news.

The successes gained in arbitration by the various locals evidence the justice of the demands made. The report of President Lynch shows that out of twenty-eight awards twenty-three granted an increase in wages. Four cases ended as they began, neither side losing, and one was a compromise, yet favored the men. Fallacious the fear of arbitration. Especially is this a truism when arbitration is threatened with a view to reduce the scale of wages at a time when everything purchased in the eating and heating line is going up, up, up, and when rents are high, high, high.

It is a wise conclusion to permit newspaper men to adjust their own scale in some cities.

There is a wide difference between organizing book and job printers and waging a war on an unfair newspaper. Unprejudiced craftspeople can easily discern this fact. Get wise.

The United Typothetæ has not yet made public its method of calculation whereby it will cost the employer 22 per cent more to work a force eight hours a day than nine hours. But at latest accounts it has not discontinued assesssing its members "to fight the eight-hour proposition to the last ditch." It must be accepted that President Ellis is fearful of adverse criticism if he should give an inkling of his superlative mathematical methods. Be frank, Mr. Ellis.

Joyous will be the bells which ring in 1906. Hope all union printers will enjoy the pleasures of an eight-hour day.

It is very much regretted that I can not attend the Portland exposition, if for no other reason than that I can not accept the very kind invitation of John J. Newton to stop off at Salt Lake City, Utah. What he promises to demonstrate to me would be so hard for him that even if I could make the trip to the Oregon city I do not think I would put him to shame by giving him a chance to demonstrate. He says that he would show me one piece town where the fast operators are no more conspicuous than the slow ones, and adds that there are as many slow operators as there are fast ones. Mr. Newton's own words demonstrate that the fast operators make slow ones. The fact that there are four of one kind and four of another does not alter the case.

The result of the trouble in San Francisco is so gratifying that a universal amen is heard. The printers conducted themselves in such a commendable fashion and their cause was so just that every paper in the Golden Gate City took their side of the proposition. The typothetæ's effort to restore the nine-hour day proved disastrous, and having lost the initial battle in a city of its own choosing, the cause it espouses is seriously and justly weakened. President Ellis will have a tough time in convincing his followers that the union printers are easily whipped, and the fellows who want to fight to the last ditch may wish to have the ditch near at hand, so that the fighting will be over quickly.

Martin Statler, of the Post chapel, spent his vacation at his home, Latrobe, Pa., where coke ovens are as numerous as are ship masts in the most prominent harbor in the country. He is known among his friends as "Jake," and is an agreeable companion at all times.

The calling of an extra session of Congress in November will put to work a number of idle printers. The big printery will soon be astir.

Just when there is a slump in the work in all other divisions of Uncle Sam's big shop Captain Ramsey's specifications division is working overtime. At present the captain's force is augmented by recruits from other divisions, and is turning out a large amount of work.

A large party of Washington craftspeople attended the convention, having taken advantage of a Niagara excursion rate over the Pennsylvania railroad. The party occupied a parlor car, and time was pleasantly spent en route.

If it will entail an expenditure of 22 per cent in the expense account of a United Typothetæ employer to change from a nine-hour day to an eight-hour day it is safe to say that no member will make the same argument in changing from a nine-hour day to a ten-hour day. Not at all. That change would be to their liking, no doubt, and without protest from their end.

The complete success at San Francisco in the effort to maintain the eight-hour day, following close upon the St. Louis affair, is proof of the justness of the contention for a shorter workday. It evidences, too, that the confidence in the present administration was well voted at the last election. But we must not be lax in our efforts. Hard work is yet to be done before January 1.

There have been fewer subs in Washington this summer than for many years. And yet the weather was not excessively hot. Maybe it was cooler at other places.

The desire among printers in Washington to become members of the Masonic society is so strong that a daylight lodge has been organized to accommodate those who work at night. C. I. Willey, the efficient chairman of the Post, has made a success in the goat-riding venture. "Gus" Warner, who graduated from the case at Syracuse, N. Y., it is understood, is petting the mythical animal so that it will not be unruly.

There can hardly be a difference between "tainted money" and "filthy lucre" to the wage-earner while the ghost walks.

"There is sunshine in my soul tonight" sings the evangelist. It will be very appropriate for all printers to chant the hymn when success crowns the effort for an eight-hour day.

The Union Label Bulletin, issued by the union label committee of the Kansas City Industrial Council, is one of the best schemes to keep before organized wage-earners the information so essential in the purchase of union-made goods.

If James M. Bell continues to publish the New York Union Printer to the standard of the issue of July 12 that publication will merit the support of the full membership of "Big Six." It is a newsy number, and seems fair to all. Of course a certain element in all large unions is always opposed to the views of others but themselves, and Mr. Bell, it is supposed, will look for knocks from that source. The Union Printer ought to succeed.

When the word statesmanship is loosely applied to a man who conscientiously endeavors to maintain a rate of wage consistent with that in force at the time, it is clearly an evidence of marked obtuseness. A strict attendance of union meetings and an alertness shown for the label will have a tendency to make some people wise.

The printers' label will be a precious trademark in the United Typothetæ's last "ditch" contention.

JAMES MONROE KREITER.

It has long been a source of wonder to me that so many compositors seem incapable of learning the correct use of the apostrophe in indicating the possessive case, there being almost no complications and practically no conflict of authority as to its correct use, but it remained for a Harrisburg head setter to entirely change the meaning of words and perpetrate a horrible joke by the misuse of this little punctuation mark. The article indicated that the lawyers of that city had offered a "spread" to a popular jurist, but the head said, "Bar Tenders' Banquet to Judge Stewart." I suppose it was the inability of the ordinary man (most compositors are ordinary men, and many are nearly so) to grasp the meaning of the apostrophe that caused the United States board on geographic names to abolish its use in geographic designations, by reason of which we have such horrors as "Frenchmans Bay," "Marthas Vineyard," "Fitchs Landing," "Harpers Ferry," etc.

Superintendent Felix Krieg, of Hollenbeck's, Indianapolis, the concern which so handsomely prints our JOURNAL, took a look at the government printing office and shook hands with a number of old and new friends the latter part of July.

"Honest John" O'Neill, of the government printing office, spent some weeks during the summer in "the ould Dart," which he had been away from for over thirty years. Chris Auracher, of the same office, is putting in the summer revisiting the scenes of his childhood, "where the Würzburger flows."

Ninety-three employes of the government printing office, members of the District national guard, went into camp with the organization at Harpers Ferry during the early part of August. They are not all printers, but a large percentage of them are.

W. E. Skelly, chairman of the Sudwarth Printing Company chapel, died July 23, after a short illness, of typhoid fever.. He was a member of the Knights of Columbus and of the Royal Arcanum.

H. P. McKevitt, of the government printing office, died August 4 of consumption. He came here about seven years ago from Texas, and at his death was aged forty-six years. He was a member of the Woodmen of the World and of the National Union Fraternal Insurance Association.

About a year ago L. D. Wheeldon, of the government printing office, had his attention attracted to a little boy, clad in nothing but a suit of "union" underwear, playing with some other boys. Inquiry developed that the boy had no home, but had stayed with one of the boys with whom he was playing for two or three days. The police had no knowledge of the case, and nobody offering any objection, Wheeldon took the boy and had him cleaned up and properly clad, and then turned him over to his landlady, saying that he would pay his expenses. He has had the boy ever since, without hearing a word as to whom he belongs, except that at the holiday season last winter a boy's wagon was left in the hallway with a card bearing the boy's Christian name and "from mamma." Mr. Wheeldon had the misfortune to be deprived of his wife and children by the great cyclone which devastated a part of St. Louis nine or ten years ago, and as the boy fits into the vacant niche of his life, he announces his intention to bring him up and give him an education and the advantages he would give him were he his own son.

At this writing Frank J. Ward, of the war department branch of the government printing office, is prowling around somewhere in Italy, he having sailed the latter part of July for a six weeks' trip. We are getting to be great globe trotters—we G. P. O. people—and I think there are a number of others in different parts of Europe, while Proofreaders F. A. Rhodrick and William F. Reed are exploring Canada. This will be cited as a reason for a reduction of pay by some backwoods solon one of these days, as Admiral Melville gave his reason for thinking the anthracite coal miners' demands were unreasonable, that some of them actually had lace curtains in their houses—a luxury that presumably ought to be reserved for navy officers.

One of the chapels of the government printing office has appointed a committee to investigate applications for relief, brought about by a subscription having been taken up for a man who had not asked it and did not want to be placed in the position of receiving charity.

George E. Lock, of Niagara Falls, asks me to explain the origin of "30" as used at the end of telegraphic news reports. I thought every one knew the origin of this symbol, which, by the way, is used only in the west, "good night" being the term in the east. But I am always willing to draw from my rich stores of knowledge for the benefit of those who really want to learn. Shortly after the civil war St. Louis was established as the headquarters of the news service for the then rapidly developing west, and a bright newspaper man named Tim Owens was put in charge. He always signed his reports with his initials, "T. O." One night a new telegraph operator was on deck, and as he looked over the copy handed in he asked:

"Fwhat's thot at the ind, Musther Owens?"

"Thim cabbleistic highayroglyphs mane thot's all," said Owens, and he then started for Farmer's to get a hummer or two before going to bed.

"T O" looked like "30" (cents) to the operator, and he sent it that way. From everywhere came demands:

"What does '30' mean?"

" '30' means 'that's all,' " replied the operator, and it has meant that ever since.

Delegate Philip S. Steele preached two sermons in the North Capitol Street M. E. Church the Sunday before starting for Toronto.

Mayor Charles G. Covert, of Evansville, Ind., is the son of Jake Covert, of the government printing office.

Dr. Marcus Benjamin, of the United States National Museum, has issued a beautiful memorial of the poet John Henry Boner for distribution among the immediate friends of the deceased. It is a magnificent specimen of printing, as well as a grand tribute to "North Carolina's first man of letters."

George F. Halsey, who resigned to become an employe of the pay department of the Panama canal commission, writes most encouragingly as to his location, the climate and the health of the isthmus. He was formerly well known in the Pacific coast region.

About forty persons, nearly half of whom were ladies, attended the Toronto convention from this city.

About three and a half years ago "Jack" Manning, the fourteen-year-old son of Dr. William J. Manning, of the government printing office, the recently appointed physician in charge of the emergency hospital of that great institution, disappeared from his parents' home, and from that day has never been heard of. Dr. Manning left no means untried to find his boy, and recently enlisted the efforts of the Salvation Army. Early in August he was informed by the mayor of Boone, Iowa, that "Jack" was there, and that he was willing to return home if enough money were sent him to pay his way. The doctor forwarded $30 and received word from the mayor that the money had been received, a ticket to Washington bought for the boy, and that he had started on his way home. After days of anxious waiting the parents are compelled to believe that the mayor was imposed on by some sharper, for nothing has ever been seen of the boy.

Daniel C. Quinn, for many years employed in the government printing office, died at Richmond, Va., on July 19. Mr. Quinn went to Colorado about a year ago in the hope of benefit from the climate, but receiving none, returned to his old home in Richmond two or three months ago. He was another victim of the "great white plague."

Titus F. Ellis, formerly of the government printing office, an old St. Louis boy, for the past two or three months has been running the cigar and news stand in the Mount Vernon railway station, the privileges of which he secured, and it is so much of a success that he is probably fixed for life. D. D. Hemming, an old retired "roadster," is assisting him during the dull times of printing.

C. I. Willey, of the Post, served as acting secretary of Columbia Union during the absence of Secretary G. G. Seibold at Toronto, and most capably filled the position. Sometimes (and only sometimes) he furnishes Post news for the Trades Unionist.

Col. G. Harry Stone, of the specifications division, for an ordinary lifetime a resident of St. Louis, was married in Baltimore about the 10th of August, but I do not know the name of his bride.

We are naturally more than proud that two of our people were honored at Toronto—Delegate Joe M. Johnston as chairman of the laws committee and ex-Delegate and Journal Correspondent James Monroe Kreiter as reading clerk.

There are not many sections of the country that have not known Joseph W. Saunders, formerly a "roadster," now a respected and respectable letter carrier of this city. Though he has abandoned most of the customs and habits peculiar to the "tourist" class, he always puts on a sub when a circus comes to town, takes the family which he has accumulated since his retirement, and makes a day of it. During his touring days he once traveled for awhile with a circus, and acquired a love for the knights and ladies of the sawdust ring which has never left him. He has recently published a little book of his adventures and experiences, entitled "Pages of the Past: Being Truthful Tales of a Traveling Typo Who Journeyed Lower Case," which is especially entertaining in these days, when the real "tourist" is only a memory, and which he sells himself, as will be found in the advertising pages of this number of THE JOURNAL. Joe is not yet on the downhill side of life, and he is so sunny natured that I think he will always remain young.

A. F. BLOOMER.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS.

Applications for membership are beginning to come in. We have voted to put the initiation fee down to 50 cents till December 31.

Vice-President Scott is reported to have gone to work in another jurisdiction and taken his card, and President Jackson has given notice that he is going back to England next month; he hasn't found the United States good enough for him.

We sent the Progressive Printer a postal card, of which the following, from memory, is a practically verbatim copy:

Cambridge Typographical Union No. 61 desires to acknowledge the receipt of several sample copies of the Progressive Printer, and to ask on what page of the magazine we shall find the union label. We do not suppose that you are sending sample copies to a union without considering the prospect of this question being asked, but we have hitherto been so unfortunate as not to look in the right place to find it.

We got the following answer:

We found the American emblem and the bust of our late lamented President McKinley on the postal you sent us the 24th, but we could not locate the union label. We forgive you for the omission, however, as we do for the sentiment of your card, which can hardly long survive the elevating atmosphere of learned old Cambridge. We very rarely receive anything in the spirit of your writing, compliment and a generous support being our goodly portion, for which we thank the busy and conservative workers, employers and employes in the craft, who admire The Progressive Printer for its fairness and firmness and for its superior technical qualities. In your efforts to find the label in our paper we hope that you have not passed over the bulging evidences of its support of organized labor's rights. Yours for justice,

THE PROGRESSIVE PRINTER,
HARRISON A. PAWLY, Editor.

Mr. Pawly's letter reminds me that it is a fine art to know how to put up a bluff of defense when you have nothing actually to say on your side of the question, and that those who have to do this will find the following hints useful. First, by all means get behind the United States flag, whether it has anything to do with the case or not. Second, intimate that your opponent is not learned and is not enough of a workingman to be busy. Third, brag that everybody is on your side, no matter if the tone of your voice does show that you hear from the other side often enough to make you squeal. Fourth, brag of anything and everything that has no relevancy to the subject in hand. These suggestions do not pretend to cover the whole art of bluffing, but they will suffice to enable you to make a pretty fair job.

STEVEN T. BYINGTON.

ITHACA, N. Y.

All the label offices here are now working eight and three-quarter hours, with the eight-hour day arranged for.

With M. J. Watkins, of No. 379, president of the central labor union here, Mr. Rundle, its financial secretary, and Mr. Shultz, one of its trustees, together with President Nevins, representing No. 379, and Mr. Watkins the central labor union, as delegates to the state federation of labor, which meets here in September, there ought to be something doing in Ithaca soon of interest to the entire membership.

The Ithaca Sign Works is now advertising for help, under the name of Crowell-Sanford Company—this is a ten-hour-day concern, and, as to conditions—well, we would warn all card men to pass it up.

The Ithaca Journal is now nicely settled in their own building on West State street and is about as nicely equipped a printing plant as any typo would wish to work in. Priest & Benjamin, its proprietors, were the second firm here to sign the agreement with No. 379, and one of its highest recommendations is its fair and manly treatment of its employes. No. 379 wishes them continual success.

Ithaca has been a convention city this summer, one more to come this month—the state federation of labor. Some day Ithaca will ask for the International. Am I dreaming, boys?

No. 379's correspondent is puzzled why those that do not attend meetings do the most kicking about union affairs. Unity of purpose, and more personal work by each one of us, will place No. 379 in line with the best.

Are the Ithaca printers at last waking up? Well, I guess.

By the way, boys, Ithaca is now a card town; if a typo, after all efforts to get him in line, fails, pass him up; he is only in the way.

Four more applications in on July meeting, and No. 379 looking after the country towns about Ithaca. Organization our protection is our motto—the future will surely tell.

It is pleasing to hear the reports of increasing demand for the label on printing here of the business men.

Lest we forget, boom the label.

Keep everlastingly at it.

Now for the report of the International convention.

DECATUR, ILL.

Colonel J. M. Schultz, our delegate to the Toronto convention, reports a rousing session. He states that the eight-hour proposition was strictly the "paramount issue," and great enthusiasm prevailed. The colonel was at first slightly "jolted" by those long whisky glasses, but soon became acclimated.

Glad to hear that Colorado Springs gets the next convention.

Your correspondent is reminded of a story about "Farmer" Coltrin, our oldest member, who is now town clerk, and will probably hold the "sit" for life. Several years ago the Millikin bank moved into their fine new seven-story fire-proof building. They notified the public of their "grand opening" and invited them to call and inspect the building and transact business with them. The people called, among them being "Farmer." After looking around the building, "Farmer" walked over to a desk and filled out a check for $1. Then he ambled up and presented it to the cashier. The cashier glanced at the check, then said: "Why, 'Farmer,' you have no deposit here." "Don't make any difference," said "Farmer." "Didn't you invite the people to come here and transact business? Where's Jim Millikin?" Mr. Millikin was called, and the cashier explained the matter to him. Mr. Millikin said, "You have no money in the bank, 'Farmer'." "Look here, Jim," shouted "Farmer," "you invited the people here to do business with you, didn't you? Well, that's what I'm here for—to transact business." Turning to the cashier, Mr. Millikin said: "Cash the check."

W. K. Addis, another member of the "old guard," has been quite ill and has lost the sight of his left eye. The sixty-nine-year-old "boy" has the unanimous sympathy of No. 215. Mr. Addis printed in the south during the war and can relate a great many amusing anecdotes of those strenuous days.

The Herald now has a new force on its three machines, Frank Beckstine going to Peoria, John Bartley to Chicago, and George Garver to the Review.

Now let's all boost for the eight hours,
And organize the country printer,
And keep boosting. T. B. LINDSAY.

DETROIT, MICH.

No. 18 has a combination of strike and lockout on hand at the date of this writing (August 20), and condensed in the shortest space possible I will give the condition at present, but expect before publication of THE JOURNAL a different story will be recorded.

On August 11 the typothetæ placed three non-card men in as many offices, to test their "open shop" policy, and the members of our local were immediately withdrawn from the contaminating(?) influence of the strike breakers. On the following day the executive committee, endorsed by special meeting and sanction of the International officers, called out every man employed by the members of the typothetæ association. Since that date twenty-six of said offices have been closed to our local. The typothetæ had secured the services of a man named Whirl, with an imposing office and the self-imposed title of "labor commissioner," to secure printers to take the place of strikers. To reduce a long local story to facts of national interest, I will state that since the lockout this so-styled "commissioner" has secured fifteen strike breakers to fill the places of 150 members of No. 18, and of that number we can confidently state that not six are to be considered competent printers. The rest are boys who at some time had been employed on the proof press and running errands.

But to make our success complete, today (August 21) the pressmen are on the street with us to "show 'em."

I am pleased to relate that President Dixon and Organizer Haight are recipients of congratulations and hold the full confidence of all the members of No. 18 in their present campaign against the "open shop."

That is all I am at liberty to state at the present date, but between now and the date of issue our International officers may have something to say.

It is unnecessary to inform the traveling fraternity that Detroit is not extending the "glad hand" to tourists at the present writing.

We are pleased to record the fact that about 150 delegates and visitors accepted our open house invitation to stop off and pay us a call, and to mention a few of the oldtimers from this "burg" as our guests is a pleasure for your correspondent to record, the most prominent of whom were Ed Wright, Michael Colbert, Tim O'Brien, Jim Morrison, J. B. Singer, "Cooney" Mueller, and last but not least, old "Hank" Smith. A committee met 100 of them Friday morning at the depot, among whom were a number of ladies, and the following program was carried out to the letter:

PROGRAM.

ON TO TORONTO.
DETROIT NO. 18.
"OPEN HOUSE"
to Delegates and Visitors to International Typographical Union Convention.
Friday, August 11, 1905.

7:15—Reception of visitors at depot, distribution of badges, programs and bouquets.
7:30—Breakfast.
8:45—Take steamer for ride to Belle Isle.
9:30—Phaeton ride about the island.
10:30—Visit to Aquarium, Horticultural Garden and Zoo.
12:00—Lunch at Pavilion on island.
1:30—Take phaetons or ride over bridge.
2:15—Board cars at Jefferson avenue and bridge for ride about the city.
5:00—Arrival at the Printers' Club.
After which visiting ladies will be entertained by Detroit ladies and the gentlemen by the members of the union until 7:15—Reception, "Dutch lunch" and vocal and instrumental music at the Printers' Club, 6-8 Barclay Place.
10:15—Good-by and Call Again.

In their enthusiasm to display their hospitality a number of our boys were precipitated from the aqua pura vehicle, and conviviality reigned supreme.

Delegate Albrecht, of Cincinnati, was our first visitor, and his card, a large figure 8, attested his support to the shorter workday crusade and is also a pretty souvenir.

The annual reunion of the London (Ont.) Old

Boys (August 14) was attended by a large delegation from Detroit and vicinity but were not permitted to participate in the parade, because they had been accompanied by a non-union band.

Proudly they stepped off the special cars
'Midst shouts of welcome acclaim—
No, not heroes back from conquering wars,
But the London Old Boys home again.

How they were dined and how they were wined,
Filled young and old with joy and mirth,
For the days are long, and their booze is strong—
Oh, they are the kings of the earth.

Proudly they started to join the parade—
A column most noble and grand—
But oh, what a shock to their native pride,
To be shunted aside with their non-union band.

Prominent among recent arrivals may be mentioned "Bill" McKenzie, who dallied with us several weeks and left with a view of Park Row and City Hall park in his eye.

"Shorty" Baumler has tarried with us a few moons and says Detroit is all right, the only objection being the fact that he has a double here—says he was mistaken for "Buster" Wonnacott—a Canuck.

"Jack" Green denies that Cleveland is his home and says he has settled down—in "Old Slow."

"Oracle" Stephenson arrived a few weeks ago and says his date of departure has not been set.

Anent our visitors: Now doth the busy little bee employ the shining hour; by which I have reference to the little political buzzer in the bonnets of delegatorial aspirants for 1906 honors—as several of the boys have already declared themselves.

Colorado Springs—1906—who? W. O'Day.

TOPEKA, KAN.

Time was when idle printers were numerous in Topeka, but that time has passed. All are working; some are working overtime.

No. 121 installed the new officers Sunday, August 6. There was but one change in the office-holding force—R. I. Palmer steps down and out as financial secretary. If it is not out of place I should like to say right here that "Dick" Palmer was a good officer; was obliging and did all that lay in his power to advance the cause of the International Typographical Union at all times. He made himself unpopular with some of the members, but as a whole the membership of No. 121 loved "Old Dick" as a secretary.

The work of the eight-hour committee has begun to show. Three country applications were balloted on at last meeting and five others were received.

Three cards were received, and the total membership is now 122 in good standing.

Arrangements are now making for a rousing Labor day celebration, and to assist in getting the prints into the line of march it was decided to assess each member of No. 121, who failed to show in the parade, $1, unless said member was compelled to work or was in the hospital for repairs.

Country publishers are said to be writing letters to the "Tea-Pot," asking all manner of questions about their show in the 1906 proposition. One showed me a copy of a letter in which he asked: "What do I get for my money? What protection, if any, do I get?"

In speaking to me he said: "I have about a baker's dozen of the typothetæ circulars and have read them all. I have no International Typographical Union men in my shop, but if I get mixed up in the 1906 quarrel I certainly will not be able to keep the men I have, for if the International Typographical Union don't get them they will go to the cities. None of that for me, thank you."

Tourists are scarce at this writing.

PERTH AMBOY, N. J.

At last the long-looked-for has happened and Perth Amboy, N. J., is the home of a typographical union. Much is due Organizer S. T. Woodrow, of Camden, for his energy and up-to-dateness, that has won for the International Typographical Union a foothold in what has long been regarded as the hopeless Jersey back-number town.

The Chronicle, a local paper, had a very nice article on the formation of the union.

Among the many new charters issued by the International Typographical Union few can boast as we can, of having upon our application a member of the board of water commissioners, a city recorder and a member who has held every office in the gift of a local excepting International Typographical Union delegateship.

City Recorder H. G. Pickersgill, though unable to be at the preliminary meeting on account of official duties, gladly availed himself of the opportunity to be on the charter. Water Commissioner William P. O'Hara, between overtime work and a meeting of the water board, nearly missed capturing the office of sergeant-at-arms. They both promise to be good in the future, however.

The by-law, constitution and scale committee will be ready by the time the charter arrives, and Secretary Bramwood can as well notify Mr. Macintyre of another eight-hour victory—now. We want it and we do not expect the least difficulty in getting it. The employers here are to be commended at the sensible view they have taken of our "getting into line," and we have no reason to think that they will change front before January 1, 1906.

P. H. Curtis.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.

At the last regular meeting of the Birmingham Trades Council, members of Typographical Union No. 104 were chosen as treasurer, press reporter, and member of the board of trustees.

No. 104 reversed itself on the "regulation ordinance" to apply to the Age-Herald operators. When the office was changed to the piece scale the boys hustled and were turning out the stuff so rapidly that they earned in five nights what the time scale required for six nights. Then No. 104 "regulated" and made thirty-six hours instead of forty-two hours the maximum week, where "subs" were available. The last meeting of the union repealed the former action.

Delegate Nock, at the last meeting, asked to be instructed with reference to probable action on the eight-hour proposition, and No. 104 voted unanimously for eight hours January 1, 1906. The vote was merely to sound the membership, and had previously been taken by chapels with the same result.

Fred Vance, of the News chapel, who is high up in masonry, was recently presented by his masonic brethren with a very handsome and valuable masonic jewel. It is a rare work of the jeweler's art, and all the symbols and mottoes of all the branches of masonry are beautifully wrought thereon. It is needless to say that Mr. Vance is very proud of it.

W. H. Cooke, one of the oldtimers, and for many years a resident of Chattanooga, is now located in this city.

Bob Vance gave up his machine on the News and left for St. Louis. Yellow fever 500 miles distant, however, had nothing to do with it.

The fine picture of the Home sent out with the last JOURNAL is a work of art that is appreciated here, and many of the boys have had the view appropriately framed. E. R. CALHOUN.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.

The belief that a few lines from this place at the present time on the true condition of affairs would not be uninteresting reading, prompts me to write.

There is not a case of fever, as far as I can learn, among the membership, and there is no fear, no panic, or no great desire on the part of any one to leave the city. Work is good in all branches of the trade, the union at its last meeting passing a five-day law. Machine operators are very scarce, and most of the operators are forced to work six and sometimes seven days, for lack of subs. Machine operators are surely in great demand.

Everything is going on here as usual, and if it were not for the papers mentioning the fever, I don't think we'd notice it. It's amusing to read the headlines of some of the outside papers.

R. A. NORMAN.

DULUTH, MINN.

Work in Duluth has improved somewhat during the past month, but the number of subs has increased accordingly. A number of the boys have been away on vacations, which has helped work for the subs somewhat.

Frank Pierce, ex-secretary of Kansas City Union, has been renewing acquaintances with old friends here.

J. P. Tredinnick, of Chicago, has taken charge of the Duluth Lithograph and Printing Company's composing room.

The following cards were read at the August meeting: F. A. Lowe, Pocatello, Idaho; P. M. McClary, Anaconda; S. S. McDonald, Sioux City, Iowa; F. F. Towne, Indianapolis; Adam Mackie, Milwaukee; L. D. Geeslin, St. Louis.

Frank Kilduff, from everywhere and bound for nowhere, is the latest arrival in Duluth.

The label question is now the paramount issue in printorial circles in Duluth. Several proprietor members allowed themselves to become suspended through non-payment of dues and were deprived of the use of the label. Thereupon all the other job offices, with one exception, refused to use the label on any work, though retaining the label in their possession. The printers and the pressmen have a committee at work and are making monthly appropriations for advertising the label. That their work is effective is evidenced by the fact that one of the obstreperous shops has most of its employes sitting around looking wise, and the rest of them are feeling a depression in business. The shop that makes a specialty of label work is working overtime.

Moral: Boom your label.

And don't forget the eight-hour day.

W. R. EASTMAN.

ST. JOSEPH, MO.

St. Joseph's delegation to Toronto included Delegate William Burlington, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Martin and Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Robinson.

"Bob" Shields, erstwhile of Butte and Helena, arrived here August 16 for a short visit. Shields operated a linotype on the Gazette and Herald before he migrated to Montana with five or six other local operators about four years ago.

When the announcement came over the Associated Press wire that Colorado Springs had been selected as the place for holding the next convention, a member of No. 40 promptly declared himself a candidate for delegate. If priority of sentiment counts for anything, he ought to land the plum.

F. G. Sprague and George Henderson, with their families, enjoyed vacations in cooler climes, the former at the northern lakes and the latter in Colorado.

John Edgar is back from a visit to Toronto and intermediate points. CHARLES RHODE.

ELIZABETH, N. J.

With all the prestige and glory which attend thirty years' "open shop" experience in New York city, the Educational Book Publishing Company has invaded our city and announced its determination of establishing an "open shop" in this 100 per cent union town. The committee from No. 150 which interviewed the manager was told of the great and lasting benefits the concern had conferred upon the school teachers of the country during its existence; how he believed the people of Elizabeth would appreciate their coming to this city, and then courteously but firmly declared for the "open shop" and nothing else.

No. 150 acted promptly, and at a special meeting declared that if it was to be an "open shop" it would be "open" to non-union men only. All card men are barred. One of the publishing company's ads offered "40 cents per 1,000 ems; fat type." The fat type is long primer. Good, isn't it? So make careful inquiry before accepting a job in this city.

In justice to the employing printers of this city who have granted us eight and one-half hours, with the promise of the eight-hour day in 1906, No. 150 could do nothing less than refuse to permit its members to work for a concern which insists on a nine-hour day, and disregards all other union requirements. We appeal to all union men and all self-respecting non-union men, to keep away from Elizabeth, N. J.

Here's another. The Campbell Art Company, of this city, advertises for a non-union printer. The college-bred gentleman running the printing department of the concern "will not be dictated to by any union," etc. The same old twaddle, you see. Well, here's what he wants: A man who, given his "copy," can make good display, arrange color scheme, put the job on the press and run it off, making a high art job of it all the way through. Such a man will receive probably not less than $12 per week of fifty-four to sixty hours. Don't all come at once.

Trade is rather quiet here, but we have plenty to talk about. T. H. BLAKENY.

ALBANY, N. Y.

Many inquiries regarding the absence of the Albany letter in the August JOURNAL and the reason therefor, is an indication that these bits of correspondence are appreciated.

For all that the day was uncomfortably warm there was a fairly good attendance at the August meeting of No. 4, Sunday, August 6. Installation of the new board of officers for the ensuing year was the principal business. Vice-President Quinn was duly installed as president and assumed the position with a few appropriate remarks. Peter J. Halpen, who was elected to succeed himself as recording secretary, tendered his resignation, as he has just accepted a position on the Press-Gazette, at Yonkers, N. Y., and M. J. Sullivan was elected and installed in his stead. Mr. Sullivan is a veteran in labor circles and has filled nearly all the various official positions in No. 4, as well as the central federation and label league. No. 4 is to be congratulated upon securing his services again at this time, in this important office. The union decided at this meeting to participate in the Labor day parade, although individual members will not be fined if they do not parade. A long communication from the Albany employing printers relative to the eight-hour proposition was read, but no action was taken further than to receive and enter the same upon the minutes, and to acknowledge its receipt to the employers with the statement that the matter rests entirely with the International body.

Several of our members attended the session of the International Union at Toronto, besides our duly elected representatives, Quirk and Markey. Ex-delegates Palmatier, Mahan and Clarke and William D. Youngs were among the number. Mr. Palmatier is an "X" of three conventions, viz.: Cincinnati, 1883; Atlanta, 1890, and Milwaukee, 1900, having been No. 4's representative in each instance.

Saturday, August 12, the employes and members of the veteran printing concern of the Van Benthuysens' enjoyed a very pleasant outing and clambake at a resort in Rensselaer. Frank Van Benthuysen presented some appropriate prizes, which were strenuously contested for in the various athletic sports held.

Business at the Hamilton street branch of the J. B. Lyon Company is very dull at present. Less than thirty card men are now working in that establishment. This chapel has never before been so few in number within the last ten years.

Alonzo K. Yates, No. 4's oldest member, died Sunday, August 6, aged seventy-five years. Mr. Yates has been a lifelong member of this union.

The Brandow Printing Company, which secured the state printing contract for another term, is running a large force night and day in its endeavor to keep pace with the large amount of work, both private and state, which it has in hand. This concern is also the state department printer.

The vacation season, which has been in full swing for the last two months, is nearing a close, and many of the boys are getting back to another year of work, refreshed by sojourns of a week or more, at either seashore, mountain or lake resort.

The clambake held at the Abbey, August 26, under the auspices of No. 4, was well attended and enjoyed to the fullest extent by all present.

Charles E. Sickels, bearing a Philadelphia card, deposited the same with No. 4 at the August meeting and is now operating a monotype keyboard on the night trick at the Brandow state printing plant.

John O. Evans is preparing to leave the printing trade for a position with the United Traction Company. He is breaking in as a motorman.

CHARLES H. WHITTEMORE.

A QUERY.

If a putative labor paper, managed by a member of a large union, undertakes to grind its employes down to the lowest notch, what are you going to do about it?

For instance, we have a so-called "labor" paper in Pittsburg, Pa., managed by a member of the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel and Tin Workers, the policy of which is that nobody makes living wages outside of the foreman of the composing room and the manager of the paper. Now to details: The manager and foreman take it upon themselves to "cut down," and in order to do so they put on a certain number of men sufficient to get out the paper, then they consider that they want an extra man for two or three days. This looks plausible, but, understand that they do not furnish copy for the regular force, in order to make work for the extra man.

They can not discharge a man without cause, but try to make things so disagreeable that somebody will quit and let him (the foreman) hire some one else. CHARLES KIZE.

Pittsburg, Pa.

LITTLE ROCK, ARK.

The Democrat newspaper and job plant was totally destroyed by fire on the night of July 23, causing a loss of $180,000. The origin of the fire is a mystery, but it is thought to have been the work of a firebug. Nothing was saved except the mail list. Copy for state printing and city directory was also burned, of which some can not be replaced. Dan Taylor, stereotyper, lost his life. He was accustomed to sleep in the building, and this explains why he was there at the time. He was buried in the typographical union lot. His former home was Dallas, Texas. Since the fire the Democrat has been issued from the Gazette office. Five new machines arrived the middle of the month and are temporarily located in a building on Markham street, for the purpose of getting out the state work. Work on the ruins of the old building is progressing rapidly, but it will not be ready for occupancy before December. One hundred people were thrown out of employment. A number have left the city.

The wife of W. Barrow, treasurer of our union, died at her home, August 10, after a long illness.

Yellow fever in the south has caused a number of printers to leave for the north, if reports are true.

Mike Gutherie, an oldtime machine man, is foreman of the Democrat.

Sterling Moore is contemplating a trip to his native land in the near future.

Glad to hear that Colorado Springs will get the next convention. Everybody here is well pleased over the choice.

Wonder if "Sport" Howard ever intends to prospect in the deserts of Arizona again with a butcherknife? OTIS WILSON.

NASHVILLE, TENN.

After several failures to pass favorably upon the proposition, the union has at last decided to celebrate its fiftieth anniversary some time during the month of September. A committee, consisting of one member from each office, has been authorized to co-operate with the local label committee in arranging for the celebration. The joint committee has not yet announced its program, but one feature of the celebration will be a souvenir of a valuable nature, containing a full history to date of No. 20, in which halftones of old members and the present officers and committees of the union will be given prominence.

The news that the next International Typographical Union convention will be held in Colorado Springs is, indeed, gratifying. The delegates will have a splendid opportunity of seeing what is being done by that noble institution, the Printers' Home, and it would not be a bad idea to have the convention meet at the Home at regular intervals of about five years. This would keep the members, through their delegates, posted all the time in a thorough manner as to Home affairs.

No. 20 will not parade on Labor day with the rest of organized labor of Nashville. This has been decided on by two separate votes.

Robert Hallum and A. E. Hill will represent No. 20 at the Atlanta eight-hour convention, which meets on August 28.

The members of this union are greatly elated and encouraged by the success of the San Francisco Union in its eight-hour fight. A number of our members express regret that the five-year contract authorized two and a half years ago will prevent the book and job men here from getting a chance to secure eight hours in this city on January 1 next. The employers here played the shrewdest game and won when the five-year contract was ordered signed, but when the proper time comes No. 20 will be there "with the goods."

Plenty of hand compositors hereabouts, but not many idle machine operators. B. A. RATTERREE.

PITTSBURG ON THE RECENT CONVENTION.

I imagine that every city, town and hamlet which had a representative or visitor at the Toronto convention will have something of praise in THE JOURNAL in regard to the splendid manner in which they were entertained at the recent gathering. On behalf of the Pittsburgers in attendance, I desire to extend a word by saying that the cities which entertain the convention in the future will find it a difficult matter to equal the entertainment accorded the hundreds who were present at the Toronto session. I am of the opinion that the pace set by our Canadian brothers will never be surpassed.

There is no city in the country but that would consider it an honor to have the pleasure of entertaining the great International Typographical Union convention. But when we take into consideration the enormous outlay of cold cash, as we witnessed it at Toronto, and the labor required to raise an amount sufficient to meet the requirement for such a treat, we pause, and ask ourself if Franklin's expression of "paying too much for your whistle" is not applicable to the city which secures the convention.

Among others, I did all in my power, from a business standpoint, to convince the delegates that Pittsburg was the proper place to hold the next convention. To my mind there was only one question to be determined by the delegates, and that was, whether it would be better to hold the meeting in a thoroughly organized district or in one partially organized. There is no doubt but that the International Typographical Union convention leaves traces of good in the city where it is held. It stimulates and invigorates the members; it encourages them to go forward and build up their organization; it introduces harmony where discord exists; it has a tendency to make friend and foe join hands in one great movement to retrieve lost ground and bring into the fold again the offices that ran so smoothly a few years ago with square men, with competent men, with honorable men, with men who were money-savers for their employers, with men who hold their obligation sacred both to the union and to others, and these were the conditions which we hoped to be able to bring about in 1906 by having the convention meet in our city.

Matter of course, there is nothing left for us to do but wait. We have "learned to labor and to wait." When the convention is held in Pittsburg —which it surely will be some day—I believe it will prove an everlasting benefit to No. 7 and to the proprietors of the newspapers and job offices as well. I am safe in saying that when the delegates and visitors come among us we will take care of them, and when they take their departure they will have no cause to enter a complaint. Our motto, however, shall be: "Business before pleasure." Come and see. CHARLES Q. LAFFERTY.

BOSTON, MASS.

A letter from Holyoke, in this state, written by a man in a position to know, informs me that "No. 253 has the situation well in hand as regards wages, hours, etc. A new scale was put into effect April 15 which increased job hands $1.50 a week, and also increased the scale for machinist-operators, and that scale is enforced and lived up to. Almost all the offices are label offices, and in those that are not our card men predominate. The only offices that do not carry the label are a few that do their own composition for their blank books and tablets; all commercial job offices being label shops. To the best of my knowledge, there are not a half-dozen non-unionists in town. As for any non-unionists being recruited from this section of the state, I would say that I have gone over the field, to some extent, and can't see that the typothetæ can get any hereabouts." All of which is very encouraging, and augurs well for the establishment of the eight-hour day in western Massachusetts.

At the last meeting of the book and job branch the sum of $5 was donated to the Newsboys' Harvard Scholarship fund, and recommended that the union donate $10. This is the first donation from any union other than the newsboys themselves. It was proposed to hold a smoke talk in conjunction with the eight-hour committee. The branch recommended to the union that a committee be appointed to consider the advisability of placing in nomination the name of a prominent member of No. 13 for lieutenant-governor of the commonwealth. It was also recommended that the union request of President Lynch that the duties of the special organizer for Cambridge and Norwood would be extended to the whole state. The branch ordered a complete new set of books for the treasurer.

On Saturday, July 28, a number of book and job men chartered the sloop Tartar, and with an abundance of all the "good things" started for a trip down the harbor. The afternoon and evening was spent in cruising around the river harbor, and Sunday morning a start was made for the fishing grounds, but the rough weather compelled the sloop to put back, and this, coupled with a dense fog, which later shut in, made fishing out of the question. Charlie Hall, Eddie Boyle, Bill Renouf, "Mannie" De Freytas and Joe Gill made things lively for the rest of the bunch, and, despite unfavorable conditions, a good time was enjoyed by all—except those who were seasick. The largest fish caught was a "skate."

I wish to thank the members of the Society of Typographical Journal Correspondents for the honor they conferred in electing me president of the society for the ensuing year. I will not say at this time what I propose to do to advance the interests of THE JOURNAL and its correspondents, but will say that I propose to utilize the efforts of every member to that end. Get busy. The eyes of 48,000 union printers are upon you.

The "'Eave-it-up" Club, of the Druggist chapel, held its annual Maine excursion on July 22, 23 and 24, going to Casco Island, Portland. Fourteen members ventured two nights on the briny deep, chaperoned by George Toothaker. To say the club maintained the dignity of its name is putting it mildly. Ex-Chairman Leggett and Fred Gove took a prominent part in the festivities. The boys are reported to have organized a real estate club on a co-operative basis, investing in Pine Tree state real estate. Superintendent Herbert Steed, Charles O. Wood, Joseph J. Dallas, Abner Thompson, "Eddie" Cutcliffe, Harry Paul, G. H. Kraufuss, "Abe" Rines, Dennie Keneally, "Billy" Herbert and George P. Brophy formed the main body of the excursionists, and they had a delightful time. John J. Shanahan, of the Druggist, has again returned to the "keyboard," after an absence of four months, due to a severe attack of pleuro-pneumonia.

The state branch, American Federation of Labor, is considering the advisability of circulating a pledge to voters to oppose, by voice and vote, those members of the legislature who voted against certain leading labor measures, including the initiative and referendum. The plan looks feasible. The corporations work hard to elect their friends and defeat their enemies. Why shouldn't we? If the working people ever expect to get representatives of their interests in the halls of legislation they must vote for them. Otherwise they will get the short end of the decision every time.

I wish to voice my appreciation of the untiring efforts of the entertainment committee and members of Toronto Union to give the delegates, ex-delegates and visitors to the Toronto convention the time of their lives. That they succeeded admirably is attested by the fact that every visitor to Toronto during the convention went home with a most exalted opinion of the Queen City of Canada and its people.

Frank K. Foster, of No. 13, will speak at Rutland, Vermont, Labor day, under the auspices of the state federation of labor. An invitation to speak at Dayton, Ohio, came too late to receive favorable consideration. During the month of July this silver-tongued labor orator delivered addresses at Hartford, Conn. (on the Fourth), Bangor, Maine, Manchester, N. H., and Providence, R. I.

Charles B. Stone, an old member of No. 13, who came out on the Rand-Avery strike, is seriously ill.

A resolution introduced at a recent meeting of the central labor union by F. W. Gutberlot, of No. 13, condemning the civic federation and calling on central labor union officers to resign from that body, was defeated after two hours of wordy warfare and turmoil.

That the typothetæ is preparing for a fight is evidenced by the frantic appeals they are constantly sending out to employing printers to join them in the contest against the eight-hour day. They make no attempt to cloak the fact that they intend to fight, but say so in so many words. What are the printers of Boston going to do about it?

J. J. Jehle, superintendent of the West Publishing Company, of St. Paul, has been here trying to hire printers for "a western city, where trouble was anticipated." He didn't take anybody with him when he left, and as far as we know his mission was entirely fruitless.

A rather abrupt change was made in the superintendency of the Boston Herald composing room

August 1, W. C. Harding, who has been employed on the Herald in varied capacities for a number of years, being replaced by D. M. Oviatt, late of the New Jork Journal. The employes of the composing room, through Chairman Sullivan, presented the retiring superintendent with a handsome gold watch as a token of their esteem. I hear that Mr. Harding has accepted a situation in the proof room.

Chairman Gill, of the book and job branch, is strongly in favor of the movement to present a union button to every new member. It is a good scheme, and should even be extended to our present membership. Show your colors.

A curious vacation coincidence—A printer friend of mine sent me a souvenir postal card saying: "Shirt out on the line; can't leave Richmond, Maine." Just about the time I received the card it was—he fell overboard.

At the July meeting of No. 13 Frank K. Foster, Thomas M. Nolan and Charles G. Wilkins were elected delegates to the convention of the state branch, American Federation of Labor, to be held in Pittsfield in October.

Brother Lock wants to know if "a girl with a rat in her hair can demand a union card from the young man who wants to print a kiss on her lips." Sure she can. The rat is a "dead one," anyway, and she knows it.

The fact that two JOURNAL correspondents received important convention appointments, one as assistant secretary, and another as reading clerk, again demonstrates the mighty influence of the pen.

I noticed several convention orators, in the midst of lengthy speeches, stop to imbibe a glass of water. I felt like raising the point that it was out of order for windmills to go by water.

Organizer McPherson is sending out postal cards setting forth the advantages of membership to those outside the fold. A good idea, and one which should set 'em thinking.

The delegate who could not make others view his proposition from his angle of vision can take comfort in the reflection that the needle, with its eye open, can not see the point.

I sometimes wonder at the egotism of the man who views himself with supreme self-satisfaction. Happy is the man who can forget all the mean things he knows about himself.

Ex-delegates and visitors to the Toronto convention, who did not have to attend the sessions, fully realized that the biggest part of the side show is often on the outside.

A convention of the printers of Connecticut will be held in New Haven the latter part of this month. Frank K. Foster will address the meeting, by special invitation.

President Moffatt, of the New England Allied Printing Trades, is arranging for a series of meetings throughout the district to boom the eight-hour day.

S. J. McBride has been elected chairman of the American chapel, Al Richardson vice-chairman, and "Scotty" Mitchell secretary.

A particularly pleasing feature of the Toronto convention was the unusually large number of ladies present. It seems peculiarly fitting that the queens of our hearts should play a prominent part in the social affairs of the Queen City convention.

Barney Isfort, now superintendent of the Philadelphia Saturday Evening Post, spent his vacation at his old home in Revere.

William Robideaux, of the New York Herald, formerly of the Boston Herald, came over on a visit late in July.

John J. Chalk has returned to town after a "hike" through the western part of the state.

The largest and most important convention ever held was the universal verdict.

A Boston letter written from Toronto, Canada, is something of an oddity.

A union suit often covers a multitude of sins.

HERBERT W. COOKE.

CHICAGO, ILL.

The teamsters' strike came to a hapless and inglorious end. Now, instead of the garment workers lying alone in the ditch, there are two admittedly strong organizations that have met with defeat. There are some lessons to be learned from the events in the three months' struggle, the principal one being that it is unwise, inadvisable and dangerous to pin faith in the outcome of a strike by relying on force and outlawry. The right to strike in a legitimate cause is indisputable. Even the employer must admit that. But the right to win a strike by the pugnacious arguments of educational committees who rely on brick throwing and pop bottle suasion as a method of demonstrating that the striker is right and the employer wrong, will sooner or later come to grief through the strong arm of the law and militant power. It is an old saying that "he who lives among wolves will howl like a wolf." Some labor unions seem loth to admit the existence of any higher authority than its constitution and by-laws, and as long as that impression prevails it can expect nothing in return foi its forceful handouts except a return in kind, and it has no one to blame but itself if it gets worsted. Officers of unions employing vigorous physical measures to attain their ends, disavow the responsibility, but while the denial looks well on paper and serves as a basis for the claim that unions are not accountable, the fact remains that action is seldom taken to convict its guilty membership. They occupy the anomalous position of winking at breaches of the peace while loudly decrying violence, under the impression that they are deceiving themselves and the public. If a union strikes and the employer can not get competent men to fill the vacancies because all competent men are union men, it may possibly win the fight because of such condition, or the employer will be compelled to close up business, or do inferior work with inferior men. But when a union declares no other man can work under penalty of death it assumes a position that will sooner or later become its undoing. Life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness can be applied as well in union constitutions as in the declaration of independence. This may not be good unionism for some, but it is good enough for a true American citizen, by birth or adoption. One can further intrench his position by the belief that unions that devote their energies to making union men instead of killing off the non-union ones are the organizations that are doing business with greater results and less trouble.

The teamsters' union is a martyr to its own magnanimity. They have been used as a catspaw to haul the burning chestnuts of other unions from the fire a number of times, and the same idiom will apply that is used in discussing the merits of prizefighters—"They have met their man." The teamsters were bought to go into the fight to revivify the garment workers' lost cause. The bargain was plainly put up to the other unions. "You pay the strike benefits of the men involved in the trouble and we will inaugurate a sympathetic strike." The proposition was unmistakable. The other unions yelled in chorus, "Hurrah! You're the stuff!" and it is a prostitution of unionism, when the garment workers' cause was lost in the shuffle, to begin crying like whipped puppies and raise the alarm that it is a fight to exterminate unionism—that the life of unionism is at stake, when, in fact, the life of sluggism, not unionism, was at stake. The teamsters sought the fight, they were whipped because they could not use slugging tactics without interference of the constituted authorities, and they and all the other unions should stand the defeat like men. Their own contracts expired May 1; they expected trouble in getting renewals, and they were willing to engage in a battle ostensibly to help the garment workers, but in fact to demonstrate their own power with a view to compelling a renewal of the expiring agreements. Every movement toward peace was blocked by either Shea, of the teamsters, or Mayer, for the employers. Shea arrogated to himself the plenary powers of a despot, ruling the teamsters' council with an iron hand. Mayer was in the fight for the money he drew as counsel for the employers and for the reputation as a union fighter or buster or whatnot. Like all lawyers, he thrives on other people's woes. With both Shea and Mayer removed the matter would undoubtedly have been settled long ago. Neither one had anything at stake except the reputation as a fighter, so they could well afford to put up monumental bluffs and high-sounding guff about the rights of labor and of capital, well knowing that in any event they would lose nothing personally.

We are all gifted with hindsight much keener than our foresight, and by keeping that well in mind unions would be controlled by sense and not sentiment. Leaders would be selected for their high character and sound judgment instead of craftiness and coxcombry. Labor would have less cause to blush for the brazenness of riotous living and graft exposures. The teamsters are whipped, but the organization is not out of business by a large percentage. I presume two-thirds of the membership were not involved in the strike. The reason for that, I have it on good authority, was that during the most critical period of the struggle, when President Roosevelt was in Chicago, the matter of extending the strike and tying up the town was considered, but necessarily abandoned by reason of the famous utterances of the president—"Back of the city stands the state, and back of the state stands the nation." The tension was at its height. The civil authorities had reached their limit. Another thousand or more strikers on the street with the increased violence it would entail would necessarily call out the troops, and the managers knew that facing troops would be a different matter from dealing with the police. So discretion prevailed and tantalizing tactics were adopted in the hope of their effectiveness.

The teamsters will recover and regain the losses. It will know a heap more than it did, and, like older and more conservative unions, will heed the lesson. It will be like the parrot, that confessed it talked too d—— much, after its encounter with the monkey.

And speaking of graft, the world should revise its estimate of the grafter. We are too apt to go into hysterical condemnation of the labor man who is accused of accepting bribes in exchange for his influence, while we wink the weather eye at the employer who furnishes the graft. The world says the first is of felonious character; the second is business perspicacity. In a recent interview between Messrs. Wright and Harding and a prominent employing printer, whose name it is inadvisable to divulge, the subject of teamsters' graft was largely dilated upon by the employer in a denunciatory manner. When asked his opinion of the man who furnished the graft his reply was: "Oh, that is an entirely different matter." And there you are.

At the election of officers of the Chicago Federation of Labor in Bricklayers' hall, Sunday, July 16, five or six men, unmasked, entered the hall in broad daylight, armed with revolvers, kicked the ballot boxes to splinters, destroyed the ballots, lined up the judges of election, and warned them that resistance meant death. They hunted around till Michael Donnelly, president of the butchers' union, appeared, kicked and jumped on him while lying on the floor, and beat him so badly that one of his eyes was laid out on his cheek, and nearly ended his earthly existence. All of which shows the manner in which rancorous labor regulates its internal disagreements. It has been the subject of columns and pages of comment in the daily and labor press. That the assault took place is accepted as fact. Without going far in the merits or demerits of the case it may be well to sum it up something like this: If the sluggers did not know Donnelly, but were compelled to identify him by the picture they carried, it must be acknowledged per se, that they were not interested labor men, or, if they were, they were hired to do the job because they were unknown. If they are unknown and can not be identified as part and parcel of any machine or clique, why all this reticence and opposition to ferreting out and punishing the culprits? Is Donnelly fearful that in pursuing his assaulters he will uncover some other line of inquiry, or is he following that Christlike command, that when one smites him on the cheek he will turn the other also? Is Charles Dold, president of the Chicago Federation, in his confession of fear of consequences, as his motive for desiring to allow the incident to drop, actuated by terror of the physical retribution likely to be inflicted by the Danites, or is there something he wants to keep covered up? If it is "nothing but a family row," as some claim, the turbulent element of the family should be put beyond hope of further disturbance. If it was instigated by the employers or their agents, as some claim, the facts should be ferreted out and full publicity given. It would be the biggest feather in labor's cap to prove that assertion, and would likely end that plan of warfare. Just for a moment, imagine this logical condition of affairs—violent strikers and sympathizers are eternally wailing against the authorities for interfering (?) in street riots. Labor (some kinds) is constantly asserting its right to govern itself and the universe. Suppose there was no constitutional government in Chicago, and things were regulated by the kind of men that adjusted the differences at the federation election? Be honest with yourself and confess your willingness or unwillingness to live in a community subject to the whims of those who believe authority should be vested in private ownership of magazine guns, billies and brass knuckles. That is the policy of the element who monopolize the limelight of labor matters in the Chicago Federation. And the balance of us who believe in law and order, not mobs; who believe in fraternity, not slugging; who believe in unions conducted on business principles, not graft, are abject followers and apologists for the worst elements that trade unions embrace. It is high time the reputable unions retired from the federation. It is rotten to the core. If possible, it is more rotten than the old trades assembly, which stunk so badly that even its firmest friends could not hide the nausea caused by the offensive effluvia that arose from its grave. It is all well enough to say the decent element should control, but how are they going to do it? If respectability must take its chances in dealing with hoodlums and those who believe in slugging, right or wrong, and the more wrong the more slugging, the prospects for respectability are complete annihilation as a factor in labor matters, because to maintain its dignity it must resort to the same tactics, and that means loss of its claim to respectability. The confession of fear to talk by labor men because of consequences to themselves emphasizes the claim that thuggery has no place in true unionism. It has been winked at in some unions, tacitly applauded in others, and now, when the chickens come home to roost, it is found that the unionists themselves are afraid of their lives —scared to death—of the same elements of outlawry they have secretly encouraged. There is no disguising the fact that the viper that was nursed in the bosom of labor has at last attacked the body that gave it life by keeping it warm, and labor bodies in Chicago can now see the effect of such teachings. It is being dosed with poison of its own concoction. It makes faces at the medicine that was intended to be prescribed only for non-union men. It makes a conscientious union man blush for his cause to think he is a tagger or hanger-on to such ignorant, brutal riffraff as now occupy the center of the stage of union matters in Chicago.

Two members of the Daily News chapel, A and B, lately took a flying two days' trip on bicycles to a northern fishing resort. A had all the fun, B all the mishaps. The unfortunate member discovered after he started that his pump was useless. His companion's did not fit. Then he bought one and broke it. Borrowing one from a boy, he loaded up with the necessary air. Two punctures followed in quick succession. Then they bought a railroad ticket and discovered they were on the wrong train. Arriving at the end of the journey, B woke up in the night nearly froze and discovered his companion had all the bed clothes. They caught two fish—a sucker and a perch as long as the average middle finger. On the return, while waiting for a train to ride part way, B wanted a drink—of water—it was prohibition territory. He started for a half-mile sprint to the well, heard a train coming just before he reached it and turned back post haste to catch the train only to discover it was going the wrong way. While finishing the outing on their wheels, B collided with an automobile and took a header in some gravel and sharp limestone. Net results consisted of both elbows skinned, hands cut, trousers torn, and knees badly lacerated on the surface. Yards of courtplaster and a decided limp are all the evidence that remain of the story—and if it is not a hard luck story, let some one else tell one.

There must be some thousands of printers who are members of the Royal Arcanum. To those of us who are not experts at figures on mortality tables the new rates appear inconsistent. The claim is made that the older members are not paying their share of the risk at their advanced age. That may be, but between the ages of twenty-five and fifty the new rates are lower—that is, the "regular rates." The member who has been paying 98 cents per $1,000 on thirty-five years for fifteen years now finds he is assessed $1.55 because he is fifty years old. And yet the supreme council does not explain how they can carry a new member at thirty-five for 83 cents when he arrives at fifty years. In other words, how can they insure one at thirty-five years for 83 cents per $1,000 under the new rates when they can not carry a risk at 98 cents for the same age under the old rates? Some eight years ago the rates were readjusted and assurance given that they were fixed on mortality statistics. The reserve fund of $2,500,000 that has since accumulated is now being encroached on, and in order to keep it intact they must needs cut off the old membership that helped to build it with the expectation of participating in the benefits for which it was established. Now, they claim they did not know then. And if they did not know then, how can they expect the rank and file to believe they know now? Will the same excuse be given ten years from now with the expectation that it will be swallowed by a gullible membership? It looks like an injustice to cut off the sixty-five-year-old member by a prohibitive tax, but that is what it amounts to, and in the face of the instance of inconsistency I have shown it will be only a question of time when the older members will get another boost to their "present attained age," and find themselves outside the boasted precepts of brotherly love and fraternity. The frenzied spirit of commercialism of the present day has succeeded the older spirit of charitableness of the past. There is one satisfaction, however. Much good has been done. Thousands of widows and orphans have been provided for, and those of the older heads will have to seek comfort in the thought that they have contributed much good to humanity, charging up the expenditure to profit and loss just the same as you take a chance on fire insurance. If you burn out you get it. If you don't you are "out" the premium.

Edward Wilcox, of H. O. Shepard & Co., and a member of the executive committee, is about to leave Chicago and the printing business for Helena, Mont., where he goes to settle up the estate of a deceased brother, and continue the business of stock raising, mining, etc.

A. H. McQuilkin, editor of the Inland Printer, is prominently mentioned as a candidate for public printer. Mr. McQuilkin smiles, modestly disavows the charge, but who knows? Stranger things have happened and the government might go farther and fare worse.

The convention is too big to do justice to. I need time to think it over. GEORGE J. KNOTT.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.

Saturday, August 12, was a gala day for members of No. 15. It came about through the invitation of the ex-delegates' association of No. 15 extended to delegates, ex-delegates and visitors en route to Toronto to stop off here a day and accept our hospitality. Not a large number came this way, but those who did were right good fellows, and made claim to enjoying themselves hugely. The program of arrangements began at 2:30 and consisted of a tally-ho ride in Higgins' mammoth twentieth century coach, drawn by eight iron gray steeds. This trip included a drive through some of Rochester's finest residential streets and parks. At 5:30 the party sat down to a well prepared luncheon in Columbia Hall, union headquarters, which was served by J. D. McGuire. Our own members turned out well to this supper, and all agreed that such gatherings should be held oftener, which is true. After this feature of the entertainment was over, another large tallyho conveyed the party to Ontario Beach, many of No. 15's members going down on the trolley. A very pleasant evening was spent at this famous summer resort, with its varied attractions, and at 12 o'clock midnight the guests, accompanied by a dozen members of No. 15, and Sam Hadden and A. E. Thompson, of Toronto Union, who also accepted our invitation to be present, boarded the steamer City of Toronto and left for the convention town. The tallyho ride on the return trip to the city was especially interesting. We refer you to Thaddeus P. Lambert, W. J. Winfield, B. C. Backus or Thomas Elliott as to the truth of this statement.

No. 15's delegates to the Toronto session, William E. Orser and Henry D. Henderson, did not participate in the festivities on ex-delegates' day, each leaving for the convention city previous to the occasion. Mr. Orser received an appointment from President Lynch on the special committee on trade relations between the Commercial Telegraphers' Union and the International Typographical Union, which began its session at the Rossin House, August 10. No. 15 was ably represented at the convention.

Thomas F. McGrath, who has held the position of foreman in the office of the Lawyers' Co-operative Publishing Company for the past seven years, resigned about August 1 and left for his home in Albany. Mr. McGrath has many admirers in Rochester, who will regret exceedingly that he has seen fit to leave this city. His fine traits of character and unquestioned unionism made him very popular here, and in whatever position he fills he will have the best wishes of every Rochesterian who knows him. His associates in the office presented him a beautiful gold watch charm, a slight token of esteem.

The ex-delegates' letterpress souvenir was a creditable little affair and was published by Robert N. Chapman.

On July 27 the central trades and labor council endorsed the eight-hour movement of the International Typographical Union and pledged its moral and financial support to the local union in its efforts to secure the shorter workday.

The birdseye view of the Union Printers' Home accompanying the August JOURNAL was much appreciated here. No better institution of its kind exists anywhere. No. 15 has contributed in all $100 to the Cummings memorial committee.

The reports of officers to the Toronto convention is an interesting and instructive document. Our thanks are due the International officers for a copy of the same. M. A. WHITMORE.

CLARKSBURG, W. VA.

Work quiet.

Two applications at our last meeting.

The James-Law Company have moved into their new home on Second street, where they have more comfortable quarters.

Charles Ward, our delegate to the Toronto convention, was unable to attend, we are sorry to state.

Did you have a good time at Toronto? If you didn't, it was your own fault. They say the "water wagon" went dry.

No. 372 is still boosting the label, it having gotten out quite a number of four-page circulars, two colors, which will be distributed.

That picture of the Home in the August number of THE JOURNAL was a peach. It shows what we are and "what we can do." Success to the Home.

The Clarksburg Trades and Labor Council held a smoker on Friday, August 11, to which an invitation was extended to all union men. The smoker was a very enjoyable one, and everybody was made to enjoy themselves. The attendance was good.

Eight hours and the label, good things to boost.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.

Since my last letter to THE JOURNAL I have been in receipt of several letters and postal cards from different parts of the United States endorsing the attempt to pass resolutions to instruct the delegates of No. 17 to take measures toward dissolving the correspondents' association, the ex-delegates' association, etc. Some were lengthy, asking for details, while others were short. A postal card from Cincinnati about covers the general trend, as follows: "Many Cincinnati printers wish No. 17 success in her efforts to kill side or 'fan' organizations." The writer evidently did not read my item carefully, for the delegates were not so instructed, the excuse being that it was not advisable to hamper the delegates with too many instructions, as they had already been instructed to vote with Philadelphia. Since then, however, sentiment has changed considerably, and the matter is being talked about in quarters which never before had given it a thought. It has created a discussion which, I hope, will be beneficial to the members in general, and if this convention does not pass laws to that end, it is to be hoped that the next convention will. Man is prone to selfishness, and no matter how innocently these "fan" organizations are started, some selfish person is sure to get in control in time and use it for his own benefit or the benefit of his colleagues or friends. Therefore, remove temptation and let us be an harmonious whole.

New Orleans has the yellow peril all right, all right, but it is confined at the present writing (August 2) to a restricted district, and has not escaped its boundaries. No printer has yet developed symptoms nor have any left the city, which shows that they are not in the least afraid, although but few are immune. G. G. Norris, of the Picayune, addressed the property holders of Algiers, urging the free use of oil and suffocating the larvæ and otherwise maltreating the mosquito, which, the authorities say, is the cause of yellow fever infection.

Street Hudspeth is steadily organizing for the eight-hour day and has gained some offices and a large number of men. He digs in and goes to work without any flare of trumpets, and has the co-operation of the members for the eight-hour movement.

Fred Alexander was elected delegate to the convention of southeastern printers, which convenes in Atlanta, August 28.

Mr. and Mrs. George D. Dunn have gone to Cincinnati to reside. Mr. Dunn was a stoneman on the Picayune and was very popular. I. A. Strauss succeeds him.

Have received an invitation and blank application to join the Correspondents' Association. No, thanks, Brother Dirks, think I will remain on neutral ground. Also received an invitation to attend the Chicago Ex-Delegates' Association's blowout, but am not going to attend convention. Money market too tight.

Charles O. Chalmers, president of the New Orleans Allied Printing Trades Council, is making a determined effort to have the label recognized both by the printers themselves and the business men, and is energetically pushing a plan which will go far towards bringing the label to the notice of the commercial public and serve to help make the eight-hour movement successful. A small vest-pocket card is printed, one side of which reads: "A customer respectfully requests that when you have printing, patronize offices using the label of the allied printing trades council." Then follows a facsimile of the label. On the reverse side is a list of firms who use the label. Each member of the union was presented with an envelope which contained about a dozen cards and a circular letter addressed to him, which was as follows:

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER—In order that the union label may be brought more prominently before the public, the allied printing trades council has adopted a system of card distribution which will at once impress you as being the most practical idea yet brought forward for educating the commercial public up to the merits of the union label. The success of the plan depends upon the faithfulness of those most interested—upon you, in whose behalf the use of the label is being urged—and it is confidently hoped that you will assist us in working out this plan by distributing the inclosed cards according to the following directions:

The Plan—When making a purchase, present your merchant, or professional man or whomsoever you please, with one of the inclosed tickets. Do this as often as you will, and get your wife and children to help you, and when you have exhausted your supply of cards, call upon the secretary of your union, or communicate with the undersigned, and secure a new supply with which to keep up a persistent rain, and thus the intrinsic value of the union label will become permanently established in the alert mind of the commercial public.

Pursuant to the action taken by New Orleans Typographical Union No. 17 in respect to a system of pensions for the purpose of assisting members who have attained an age necessitating relief, the following rules and regulations governing the pension department were established: A board of pensions of four members and the president, who shall be elected to serve one and two years, respectively. The benefits of the pension system shall apply only to a member who has been a union printer for twenty-five years and has been on the roll of No. 17 for ten successive years. The pension allowances are upon the following basis: Class A, for first five years, $2 per week; class B, second five years, $2.50; class C, third five years, $3; class D, fourth five years and thereafter, $3.50, the limit; pensions to be paid monthly. Whenever it shall be found the basis of pension allowances shall create demands in excess of the amount of the fund, a notice of such change must be given at the beginning of the year in which it is decided same is to be put in effect. Members upon the pension roll are subject to all laws, rules and regulations of the union, except the payment of dues, assessments, etc., and may be dropped for conduct unbecoming, etc., with the right to appeal to the union for reinstatement upon a two-thirds vote. These rules and regulations are to take effect January 1, 1907, and, of course, they are only in an embryo state, for we do not just yet know what amount of money will be called for. As the good work is carried forth, conditions will arise which will necessitate some changes and maybe an enlargement of the pension itself. Anyway, it will give us a chance to increase the fund to fair proportions.

The Picayune chapel has organized a temporary yellow fever benefit association for the purpose of helping any member who may be stricken.

Newspaper rumors are floating in the air thick and fast. The Item has changed proprietors, the States has purchased the Evening News, which has been separated from the American. The latter is now printed in a different building, under new management, with the name America. Other rumors are going the rounds, but are not confirmed.

E. G. CLARK.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

If one were to judge from the number of changes and improvements made in some of the offices of this city they would undoubtedly come to the conclusion that some of the offices are not losing money fast enough, or that in spite of the eight-hour day staring them in the face, some of the master printers have come to the conclusion that if the eight-hour day is to be the outcome of the present controversy, they will at least have an office and facilities that will enable them to produce work at a profit. Most notable among the many changes may be mentioned that of the Murphy-Travis Company. After going through several disastrous fires, having their plant ruined and business delayed, this firm has recently moved into a ground floor corner building, occupying two floors and basement. It is undoubtedly one of the most sanitary shops and withal one of the most complete offices west of Chicago. In removing to this location the firm has made arrangements to practically double its capacity, both in the lithographing and the poster printing. Another firm that has considered hygienic conditions in making a change of location is that of the Miller-Davis Printing Company, who now occupy roomy quarters on lower Nicollet avenue. The A. B. Farnham Company also increased its capacity about 50 per cent, and, in addition to this, styles itself the A. B. Farnham Printing and Stationery Company. Superintendent Charles A. Greenwood, an ex-delegate of No. 42, has certainly accomplished wonders in the short time that he became associated with this firm. All in all, it can truthfully be said that the master printers of Minneapolis are making for up-to-date and money-saving environments, and it is to be regretted that these magnificent workrooms will be the scene of turmoil and strife in the immediate future. Let us hope that, with the improved conditions that prevail in almost every office of any consequence in this city, it can be demonstrated to the master printers that the men will take on new life and show them that it is possible to accomplish more in eight hours than was possible formerly in ten. At least, if one were to judge from the happy and contented look upon the faces of the workmen, their hearts seem to be in their work, and such being the case, the results should be entirely satisfactory to those who give them employment. While speaking of the master printers, it occurs to us to mention what one of them said to the president of the allied printing trades council when interviewed as to renewing his contract for the use of the label. "No, I do not care to advertise the printers or allied crafts any longer at the expense of myself and my customers." Here is something for some of the bright correspondents of THE JOURNAL to take up. The subject is one that should call forth some sock-dolager arguments. At least so it impresses the writer. And the strongest could be made from the side of the label advocate.

During the past three or four months practically all contracts with the allied printing trades council have expired, and when it came for a renewal, some rather warm arguments were entered into. Notwithstanding the fact that some of the master printers anticipate trouble in the near future, practically all but two of the union offices of the city have renewed their contracts, dating up to January 1 and July 1, 1906.

We have in the past commented in a laudatory way upon the fitness and capabilities of W. H. Williams, ex-printer, now labor commissioner, and all the while a stanch unionist. Since his advent into this office we can not help but take exception to some of his public acts. The only one which we will comment upon at the present time is that of issuing and causing to be issued printed copies of factory inspection, posting them up in union and non-union offices, and neglecting to ask his printer to put the "little joker" on. If Mr. Williams will recall the fact that it was not the unorganized forces of the state who caused that office to be created, he will readily see that the people who taxed themselves to create an officer to look after the interests of labor in general, the least that an officer could do, would be to insist that all of his stationery and printing bear the union label.

Under Mr. Williams' supervision a free state employment bureau was established at the beginning of this year, and under the local management of Louis Levy, an active member of the cigarmakers' union, it has become one of the greatest boons to labor and employers that ever has been enjoyed in this state. Thousands of men and women have secured positions through its offices, and hundreds of calls remain unfilled. Of course, the great majority of the applicants are unskilled in any special line of work, but when one takes into consideration the fact that employment agencies sometimes take all the money the applicant can scrape together to pay the fee, and then ship him to some place where he can walk several hundred miles before he gets a job, it is proving itself indeed to be the friend of both the organized and unorganized worker. More reason why all workers should help themselves by becoming a member of some closed shop organization.

Phil Prenevost, erstwhile machinist on the Minneapolis Daily News, has recently become identified with the Journal, doing extra hazardous stunts shunned by Machinist Hans Holt.

"Pete" Martin, of Manila fame, is once again a resident of this city, and is feeding metal to one of the machines on the Journal.

Frank Kilduff was in the city recently, and informs Major William McGillicudy that "Jim" Town, N. D., was strongly union. Mr. Kilduff said he was somewhat in a hurry when he left, for the reason that it was rumored up there that cold weather was but a few days away, and he did not care to hibernate nine months in the year.

This union gave a family picnic during the past month. It was a land excursion—no water—according to some of those who attended. It was a success financially, and credit is due those having the event in charge. WILL J. ROHR.

MONTREAL, CANADA.

Hats off to Toronto!

Also to the woman's auxiliary.

There can not be too many ladies at our International conventions.

Did you see Fred Wilson in the Virginia reel—"the smile that never came off."

The trip to Hamilton and the lunch on the mountain was an immense success.

"Jumbo" was everywhere in evidence.

Organizer James, of the local committee of arrangements, wore a perpetual smile, and as a leader on the dance platform was a success.

Secretary Chinn was a busy man.

The veteran, John Armstrong, seemed to be everywhere.

The glass that cheers gave way to the smiles of the ladies, who were everywhere in evidence.

The vote on the expulsion of Shelby Smith was a most emphatic declaration that the convention is the highest court, and is not to be trifled with.

The annual outing of Montreal Typographical Union No. 176 took place July 15. It was a great success, the committee being obliged to engage an extra boat to carry away the crowd. A splendid program of games was carried out. A brochure was published, which yielded a handsome revenue. An article appearing in the brochure entitled "How Jones Saved the Twig," should have been credited to A. F. Bloomer, of Washington. John Cantwell was responsible for the steal.

William F. Reed, of the government printing office, Washington, spent a few days here on his annual vacation. He afterward left for the Maritime Provinces and the New England States.

The annual picnic and games of the Star chapel was held July 1. It was a big success. On the return trip a sad accident occurred which put a damper on what had been an enjoyable outing. John A. Moorehouse, son of John Moorehouse, one of the oldtime printers of this city, fell overboard and was drowned. William Gilmour, ex-president of No. 176, and delegate to Washington, made a heroic effort to save the lad, but owing to the swift current the boy had been carried too far ere Mr. Gilmour could reach him. The Royal Humane Society has taken the matter up and intends presenting Mr. Gilmour with a medal for his bravery. Mr. Gilmour richly deserves it, for very few people would have had the temerity to jump in clothes and all, into a stream thirty feet deep, three miles wide, and running seven miles an hour, in an effort to save human life.

The Herald has moved to Victoria Square, where they have secured quarters about 80 per cent larger than the old ones.

Recently a fire was threatened in the Gazette pressroom. A lighted match was applied to a form washed with benzine to see if it was clean—it was clean, as the building was cleared in five minutes.

Recently the Gazette management asked the three monotype operators to work for $16 per week of fifty-four hours, the scale being $15 for forty-eight hours. After consultation the matter was adjusted at scale basis.

The writer has become a member of the Society of Journal Correspondents, thereby declaring himself a self-elected correspondent.

An article appearing in the Toronto World, signed by several labor editors, declaring that the convention has placed a gag on the liberties of the press—on account of the expulsion of Editor Smith—was unwise. A line must be drawn between liberty and license. When the officers of an organization of about 50,000 members are accused of being in league with the opponents of said 50,000 members it can not be classed as criticism, which the honest press is entitled to, but a direct charge, which at once places the positions of those officers in jeopardy, as also their cards of membership and their honor as individuals. It is, therefore, the bounden duty of the members, who placed those officers in charge of the affairs of the organization, to ascertain the facts in the case. In this connection Mr. Smith, nor any of his colleagues, had absolutely no defense to offer, and had to take the consequences. There is no body of men more in favor of the liberty of the press than the members of the International Typographical Union, and it is a reflection on the intelligence of the 209 delegates who voted for the expulsion of Shelby Smith to say that the delegates were wrong and a half dozen editors right. JOHN CANTWELL.

IMMERSED IN A BARREL OF INK.

All the antipodean printers who ever visited Rome, Ga., remember big-hearted Dick Dempsey. Although Dick never left his native heath in search of work in all his born days, he was always willing to part with his last cent to a less fortunate brother who happened to hit Rome on the "hummer."

Back in the 70's Dick belonged to the fire department, and he was a "regular" on the Rome Courier, and the fire department was to have a big "blow out," where eatables and drinkables and a general good time were in store for the fire laddies. Subs were scarce along about this time, and Dick was bothered how he would get a representative to represent him, while he "took in" the big times at the firemen's hall. However, Shorty Simmons, who hails from some town in Pennsylvania, and Frank Sheran hit Rome. Dempsey was in great glee, and he took the boys to the bosom of his family and wined and dined them. He secured the services of Sheran to represent him on the Courier that memorable night, and Dempsey hied away to the firemen's hall. When it came time to go to work on the Courier Sheran and Simmons had imbibed too freely that evening, and neither could have hit the "e" box with a baseball bat. So Dempsey was called back by the foreman to work. Dempsey was awful mad, and Sheran and Simmons were up in the office bothering Dempsey. There was a barrel of ink in the office behind the old Campbell press, and Dempsey grabbed Simmons and ran to the ink and plunged his head in the ink up to his shirt collar. Simmons was the funniest sight I ever beheld. Two doctors worked on him all night, and we saw Simmons about a month after in Macon, Ga., and he still had ink in his hair. Dempsey paid the doctors for their work on Simmons, and he and Sheran and Simmons wound up by having a good time, and Dempsey gave them each a dollar on leaving town. G. S. McAfee.

CHARLESTON, W. VA.

No. 146 is enjoying a peaceful existence at present, and having a scale signed for the eight-hour day at the beginning of 1906, she is doing some missionary work in the line of getting in members from isolated villages and in making it plain to the employers that eight hours need not cause them loss, as the men can work that length of time without becoming exhausted. I do not think the typothetæ received much encouragement from this section, as the employers and employed get along very amicably under the present system of eight and one-half hours and are making their arrangements for the inception of the shorter day.

The newest signer of the scale is the Lovett Printing Company, Inc., it having purchased the mechanical department of the Kanawha Rubber Stamp and Printing Company. The latter named concern will operate a general office supply and typewriter business, besides handling the finer grades of embossed and engraved stationery.

Work is fair in all the offices here, with plenty of help to supply the demand.

John L. Mason, a prominent member here several years ago, but who has been in the newspaper business in the Pomeroy Bend during the interval, has returned here and made application for membership. He is working on permit at the Donnally Publishing Company.

At the August meeting E. E. Parliament was unanimously elected vice-president to fill the unexpired term of W. P. Campbell, the latter expecting to be out of the city.

The allowance of the delegate to Toronto was increased by a handsome amount at the last meeting.

C. E. Jordan, machinist-operator at the Tribune, has been ill in the hospital for several days, but is out again now. He will leave in a few days.

The trades assembly has decided upon Island Inn, a picturesque spot a few miles up the Elk, on the C. & C. Ry., as the place to hold their Labor day celebration and picnic. D. C. Lovett, jr.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Organizer Scott attended the July meeting of the union and made a very favorable impression. Heavy rain prevented the full attendance that had been hoped for, and also compelled the members to meet in the pavilion at Boyden Heights, a suburban summer resort, instead of in the open air and under the shade of forest trees. Three new names were added to the eight-hour committee, enlarging it to five, one of the original members resigning. It was voted to appoint a committee of five on the newspaper scale, which expires next February. It was stated at the meeting that almost every printer in the city is now a member of No. 33. Organizer Scott's address was interesting and outlined the present condition of the eight-hour movement in New England. At the conclusion of the meeting, he made his first acquaintance with a Rhode Island clambake, in the company of many of his newly-made Providence friends.

The eight-hour committee will undoubtedly prepare in a thorough manner for the work that is expected of them. Exact information of the condition of the trade in this jurisdiction will be prepared, and it is hoped that the master printers will not prove to be so stubbornly opposed to the shorter workday as some have supposed. With every newspaper printer in the county working eight hours or less it ought to put stamina into the book and job men to know that more than half of the craft will be at work and prepared and willing to help them in their struggle to put their portion of the craft on the same footing as the newspaper section.

Providence Printing Pressmen's Union No. 114 held its annual outing at Crescent Park July 15. The principal event was a ball game between nines representing Remington's and Livermore & Knight's printing offices. The former won, 12 to 6. The clambake at 6 P. M. ended the day's festivities.

Nathan M. Ormsbee, the oldest printer in Rhode Island, started on his eighty-fifth year September 1, having been born on that date in 1821. His apprenticeship to the trade began in the 30s as roller boy on the Republican Herald. In the 1840 presidential campaign he worked as a journeyman on The Gaspee Torchlight, a campaign paper published in the interest of the elder Harrison. His name appears on the Journal pay roll in 1846. All of his companions in the office at that time are dead. The first meeting on record of Providence Typographical Union No. 33 was held April 18, 1857. Nathan was voted in at that meeting in company with nine others. Of these all are dead except Alexander M. Robertson, of Lakewood, R. I., and Hon. E. L. Freeman, of Central Falls, now and for many years printer for the state. Nathan was secretary of the union in 1872, and retired from active employment in 1877. He enjoys good health and says he expects to live about thirty years longer.

The fourth annual outing of the employes of the Journal was held at the grounds of the Warwick Club, July 16. About 130 attended. The weather was ideal, and all the pleasures incident to a visit to the shores of Narragansett Bay, when the clambake is in season, were enjoyed. A new feature was the publication of The Providence Journal, Jr., an eight-page three-column paper, filled with hits at the foibles and eccentricities of all, from office boy to managing editor. How Ike Beals failed to win the fat-men's race will be told for many a day and will bring a laugh every time.

The announcement of the death of Thomas Carleton Gawley, which occurred in New York city on the 25th of last June, recalls the personality of one of the famous traveling printers of the 70s and 80s, who frequently visited Providence. It was in this city he met the lady who became his wife. He was born in Chatham, Ont., February 24, 1850, and in that town started to learn printing in 1863. He first deposited a card with Providence Union August 13, 1870. In 1904 he wrote: "Having worked all over the United States, Canada and Mexico, I can truthfully say that Providence, in the early 70s, was the ideal town for 'birds of passage.'" For the last ten years of his life he was a proofreader on the New York Herald.

The statement in my letter in the July JOURNAL that Providence Union had not elected two delegates to the International Typographical Union from 1868 to the present year was a mistake. In 1887 the union was represented at Buffalo by James P. Bowes and Joseph N. B. Meegan. Both are now deceased, Bowes dying March 6, 1894, and Meegan November 9, 1895.

Treasurer Rudolph DeLeener has been enjoying a two weeks' vacation, mostly at Old Orchard Beach.

James H. Russell, of the Worcester Telegram makeup force, passed his vacation in this city. He was the first foreman of the Providence Telegram, and was also foreman of the Pawtucket Times for many years. WILLIAM CARROLL.

JUST A LITTLE VACATION.

It certainly was hot in our composing room the first part of July, and goaded to desperation by the perspiration which was more than profuse, I made up my mind to take a vacation during the heated term. How I carried out my intentions, whom I met in different cities and how they treated me is set forth in the following lines:

My first stop was at Springfield, Mass., where I found quite a bunch of old friends, including Morris P. Cavanaugh, of the Republican, whose greeting was more than cordial. Morris is an oldtimer in the printing business, has been a power in Springfield politics, having served as president of the common council and as councilman, and has often turned apparent defeat into victory for his party in a strong opposition district. He has developed into quite a philosopher, and his opinions on the International Typographical Union and local unions, the labor movement in general, and municipal, state and national affairs are well worth listening to. He is a bankman on the Republican and an established feature of this great paper.

My old friend, Eugene Keefe, still manipulates the keyboard on the Republican and at present tips the scales at a figure I am reluctant to mention, as it would seem incredible to those who have not seen him of late years and noticed his increase in weight. 'Gene was delegate from Springfield to the International Typographical Union convention in Atlanta, Ga., in 1890, and has always been a prominent member of No. 216.

Larry Sheehan was another old friend who seems never to grow older, despite the fact that he has worked on the Republican for over twenty-five years. As a linotype operator he is a top-notcher and keeps them on the move all night. He is the same jolly Larry as of old and has the glad hand for all former Springfield prints.

William Amann, foreman of the Republican, continues to get out the paper as a model of typographical excellence, and conducts the composing room to the advantage of the men and to the satisfaction of the office. He looks as young as he did fifteen years ago, and is good for a long life. He is a member of the Don't Worry Club, and lives strictly up to its principles.

It was with regret that I could not see Martin McMahon, one of the standbys of No. 216, but he was on a vacation, and I must call again.

The Republican operators work under a piece system, and I was informed that they earn over the scale at 10 cents per thousand.

Climbing up the (not) golden stairs of the Union office I had the pleasure of greeting W. D. B. Mitchell, who operates a machine on the morning edition and who represented Springfield at the International Typographical Union convention in Birmingham, Ala. He has held many offices in the local union and the Springfield Central Labor Union and is recognized as a sincere worker in the labor movement.

With the smile that never comes off I was greeted by Bill Moody, who is now a makeup on the Union and has not changed since the old days before the advent of the machines. Mr. Moody is everybody's friend and is cordiality itself in his greeting of old friends.

A hearty hand-clasp from Jack Hynes, who is night foreman of the Union, was a reminder of old and pleasant days when we filled our sticks together on the old Union and cursed the proofreader in the same breath. That was a great bunch, indeed. As far as I can remember, back thirteen years, it was composed of Carl Wythe, the present day foreman of the Union, who still wends the peaceful tenor of his way in conducting his office on a first-class basis; Bill Strange, now in New York; Frank Stiles, whose whereabouts I do not know; Jim Griffin, one of the finest boys that ever lifted a type, now only a memory, he having died a few years ago; James Henihan, who I was unable to see, as he was confined to his bed by illness; Lon Livingston, now in New York; Fred McKenzie, also of the metropolis; Mike Shea, a great josher and a grand fellow, who is now in New Haven; Dan Phillips, the veteran adman; a fellow named Holbrook, who was a fine printer and a thorough unionist; Jim Hannah, who now controls the destinies of the Homestead composing room; Sam Strangford, the tall Indian of the proofroom; Jim Biggins, who died in Boston several years ago; William Webb, who is now a job printer; Billy Goodell, now of the Springfield Printing Company, and others I can not now recall who helped to make the Union chapel the banner one of the city. Among others I had the pleasure of meeting were Messrs. Suydam and Gibbons, operators on the Morning Union; Dan Friese, adman, late of New York; Miss Kate Hynes, whose membership in the union dates back to 1886 and who is esteemed by all the printers of Springfield as a valuable member of No. 216. The scale here is $23 for night work and $21 for day work, seven and one-half hours constituting a day's work.

Leaving Springfield, I went by trolley to Boston, 100 miles, and rode through the finest part of New England, the farming section being an ideal one, while the villages and cities were all active with large manufactories, generally cotton mills, paper mills and shoe factories.

Arriving in Boston, my first call was made upon Thomas F. Kane ("Bootjack"), who runs a machine on the Journal and lives at Beachmont, a seashore village, six miles from Boston, where he is held in the greatest esteem by a large circle of friends. Mr. Kane was not working when I met him, having trouble with his eyes, but expects to be in good shape for the International Typographical Union convention in Toronto, to which he was elected one of the delegates from Boston, and incidentally chosen to carry the credentials. He is a prominent member of the Revere Yacht Club, which has a number of printers on its roster and has as fine a club house as can be seen in a journey along the coast. The members of the club, printers and all, are lavish in their hospitality to their guests, and are the greatest bunch of entertainers that ever reefed a sail or spliced the main brace. While at the club I had the pleasure of meeting Jim O'Connor, of the Globe, whom I used to know in Worcester; Bill Sullivan, of the Boston American; George Hobin, formerly of Springfield and elsewhere; Mr. Dennett, of the Herald; Charlie Scott, organizer of the International Typographical Union for New England, whom I discovered to be an old Syracuse friend; Dick Mitchell, of the Herald, who worked overtime to make my stay pleasant for me; Mr. Lee, of the Herald, a Providence boy, who is one of the choicest of a bunch of fine fellows; Norman McPhail, well known as a hard worker for unionism in the Hub, and others whose names I do not recall, but whose kindness will ever be gratefully remembered.

On account of the heat I did not visit many of the newspaper offices, but managed to meet quite a few old friends, among them Jimmy Hickey, of the Herald, whom I worked with in Manchester, N. H.; Henry Foley, of the Herald, a former Springfield boy; Billy Sinclair, of the Herald adroom, who used to drop in often on Syracuse in the old days; Harry Mills, of the Transcript, a former Missouri river pirate, and others whom I met while I was in a state of forgetfulness caused by the excessive hospitality generally extended to me. I came near leaving out John Joseph Punch, who was a new arrival. John Joe looked fine and was headed for Taunton, Mass.

Well, to make a long story short, the pace was too swift and I stood in a fair way to be killed by kindness, so after two weeks of unalloyed pleasure I homeward flew, stopping only in Albany, where I found my old friend, Charlie White, still on the Argus night side and doing well. He showed me the Argus plant, which is surely a large one. As I left the Argus office I ran into Thomas D. Fitzgerald, president of the State Allied Printing Trades Council, who works days on the Argus, and he took me in charge and showed me Albany pretty thoroughly. He gave me the best time I ever had in the Capital City, and I have been there a few.

Thoughts of good old Syracuse now drove all other things from my mind, and I made a bee line for a varnished car and in due time reached the City of Salt. It seemed good to return even after the good time enjoyed elsewhere, and I was kept busy telling the Syracuse bunch who were in the different eastern cities and how they were getting along.

The novel feature of my vacation was that I had to come back and go to work to get rested.

Syracuse, N. Y. F. A. Ward.

A REMINISCENCE.

The last boat of the season had come down from Nome, her passengers and freight had been discharged, and the former had separated and become lost to view in the numerous rooming houses and hotels in Seattle, the largest party of the returned gold seekers and promoters finding quarters at the Old Northern. This old hostlery, with its genial warmth, comfortable quarters and oldtime hospitality so generously dispensed by the big-hearted host, has a peculiar fascination for those sturdy men who have made the northwest what it is today, and many have been the recitals of hairbreadth escapes and thrilling adventure indulged in by the merry groups gathered within the old hotel rotunda on winter nights.

On the evening of the day on which the Nome boat arrived, a party of gay spirits was sitting in the office exchanging experiences and coaching each other upon the peculiarities of the different sections visited in the bleak northwest. During a lull in the conversation one of the party drew a massive gold watch from its hiding place, the inside pocket of his vest, and, having consulted it for the time, was about to return it, when one of his companions asked the privilege of examining it. This was courteously granted, and after feasting their eyes on the beautiful timepiece and many expressions of admiration for its rich workmanship had been indulged in, the owner returned it to his pocket with the remark, that, during the early days in Texas the cattle kings were wont to use such things as missiles, to determine bets as to which could throw the farthest. One old fellow, who had been an attentive listener, but had taken no active part in the proceedings, now spoke up and asked the owner of the watch what year he was in the cattle country. He replied, in 1874. Here the old fellow turned, facing the party, and began:

"Gentlemen, our friend's allusion to one of the pastimes indulged in by the cattle barons of the early days of Texas, namely, using their elegant and costly chronometers as missiles with which to determine bets, is but one of a thousand ways in which they showed their utter disregard for consequences, so long as their craving for novelty was satisfied. I well remember those days—boyhood days tinged with prismatic hues of memory—when cowboys rode into Santone on ponies with morocco and embossed patent leather saddles, with solid silver stirrups and pommels, horsehair bridles braided with silk, quirts with diamonds, rubies and sapphires imbedded in the handle; gold mounted, ivory handled forty-fives hanging from patent leather belts, and loaded with cartridges the shells of which were pure gold, with silver bullets, and powder scented with heliotrope and other rare perfumes; buckskin suits braided with silver, and gold-laced sombreros. Truly it was a grand sight. And I am reminded of a banquet given by the cattle kings just after the war, in 1868, which would make one of Mrs. Bradley-Martin's functions look like a two-spot. The occasion to which I refer was strictly an invitational affair, invitations to which were engraved on $20 gold pieces, each being encased in a richly worked morocco case, tipped in silver filigree work and mother of pearl, on the cover of which was the guest's monogram inlaid in pearl.

"Upon the night of the banquet favors were laid beside each of the 250 plates. These consisted of beautiful calla lilies; in the center of each nestled a three-karat diamond of the first water. At the entrance had been erected a canopy ten feet long and eight feet high, constructed of Marechal Neil roses, carnations and orchids. Costly rugs and tapestries of oriental weave were laid from the entrance to the carriage block, and extended for 100 yards either way, leading to the canopy. The walls and ceilings were rich in emerald green festoons, alternately studded with precious stones and costly roses, the latter having been imported for the occasion from some of the most noted conservatories of that beautiful land of sunshine and flowers—grand old Italy.

"The table setting was of the richest. Fine linens, genuine Turkish damasks, the product of the royal looms of the sultan, supplemented by rare old china and Sevres ware, cutglass and silver adorned the board. In the center of the room miniature fountains, constructed of glass, connected with which were artistically wrought designs of glass tubing, through which played water of crystalline purity, all forming a most unique and pleasing feature.

"The costumes of the gentlemen present (purely a stag affair) were in keeping with the regal splendor of the elaborate appointments. Black silk velvet dress coats, white satin vests, and cream-colored broadcloth pantaloons. On the coats were $5 gold pieces in the place of the ordinary buttons, while the vests were fastened with $2.50 gold coins.

"Hidden from view in the banquet hall, shielded by a monster floral design representing Music, was an orchestra of 150 pieces, which, during the elegant repast, enlivened the occasion with selections from Strauss, Verdi, Mozart and other old masters, above the soul-entrancing strains of which the frequent snapping of the champagne corks furnished a charming accompaniment as they soared toward the ceiling, while the contents of the bottle took an entirely different course. Gentlemen—"

Here the old fellow looked up, but his gaze fell on empty chairs. Up at the desk was a group of men engaged in an excited dispute with the clerk. The old fellow arose and, leisurely wending his way to the desk, addressed them as follows:

"Gentlemen, I lied. It never happened. It couldn't happen in Texas. And for the benefit of the gentleman from the Lone Star state with the large and boisterous yellow super, I desire to place myself on record by enunciating in language too plain to be misconstrued even by mortals of ordinary intellect, that I can, with a pint of booze and a consumptive cayuse for working capital, buy the whole d——d state of Texas. Gentlemen, I bid you adios."

And with a Chesterfieldian bow he turned to leave the party, when lo, and behold! I gazed upon the familiar features of my oldtime friend and side kicker—Jack Jourdan. W. H. ROBERTS.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.

One of the saddest occurrences that ever took place in printing circles here happened July 7 in the Post-Standard composing room, when Michael O'Connor, of Montreal, Canada, died of pulmonary hemorrhage. He had been in the office but a few minutes when he began to expectorate blood and died in about five minutes after the first attack. He came here from Rochester on the evening of July 7 and was apparently in his usual health, but it appears he had a hemorrhage while in Rochester. The death occurred just as the chairman called "Time" for lunch at 11 P. M. He was known by all the Post-Standard boys, but only a couple of them saw him before death, as he had reached the makeup room only when he was stricken. His brother, Edward O'Connor, of the New York Herald chapel, was communicated with and immediately came to Syracuse. After a consultation with the officers of No. 55 it was decided to inter the remains in this city, and the services were held under the direction of the funeral committee of No. 55, with a requiem high mass at St. John the Evangelist Church, and a funeral sermon by Rev. Father Dwyer. The deceased brother was laid away in St. Agnes cemetery, and another of the craft had passed into the great beyond. Michael O'Connor was thirty-nine years old, and learned the printing trade in Montreal. In his youth he was an all-around athlete, and made a name as a lacrosse player, being connected among others with the famous Junior Shamrock Lacrosse team of Montreal and the New York Athletic Club team. He was a fine-built specimen of manhood and the last time he came here before his death weighed 210 pounds. He had been sent to the Union Printers' Home from Grand Rapids, Mich., about a year ago, but was forced to leave because of inability to stand the climate after a short sojourn there.

George Utting, who learned the trade on the old Syracuse Standard, departed this life July 1. He had not worked at the printing business in the last few years, having taken up outdoor work on account of his health and filling the position of conductor on the street railway here, afterward following the same vocation in Schenectady. He is survived by two brothers, both printers, James B. Utting, of this city, and Walter Utting, of the New York Tribune. The funeral committee of No. 55 had charge of the obsequies. An appropriate floral design was secured and the members turned out in a body to pay the last tribute of respect to their departed comrade.

Eddie Hummell, who had been subbing on the Post-Standard machines, was called to Springfield, Mass., July 30, by the death of his young son. He is now working in Springfield.

Miss Nellie Mosely, of the Post-Standard proofroom, was the victim of escaping gas in her apartments on August 5 and is still under the care of a physician.

James Taylor, M. L. Higgins and C. E. Kochenberg, of the Post-Standard, and W. E. Elmer, of the Journal, attended the International Typographical Union convention at Toronto.

Donald McPherson has transferred his affections from the Post-Standard to the Telegram; Howard Reynolds and John Carroll have left the Telegram for the Journal; "Doc" Aberton is doing the "fancy" at Lyman Bros.

Charles H. Corregan, the bete noire of No. 55, is running a Lanston monotype at Lyman Bros.

No. 55 has decided to take the Corregan conspiracy case to the court of appeals.

The writer received a fine and well-written letter August 14 from Thomas F. G. Dougherty, better known as "Kid," who is now back in Minneapolis, Minn., after a long sojourn in San Francisco and Los Angeles. He gives a graphic and interesting account of an ocean trip from San Francisco to Seattle and describes printorial conditions in the northwest at length. He is enthusiastic over the work of the union in Los Angeles against the unfair Times, and says Organizer Fennessy and Arthur Hay are the right men in the right place. Mr. Hay is a former president of No. 55.

George A. Somarindyck, of the Post-Standard, leaves September 1 for Memphis, Tenn., to assume the business management of the News-Scimitar. He has been business manager of the Post-Standard here for the past three years, having been foreman of the composing room and proofreader previous to his taking the management. He was one of the original force which started in on the post at its inception ten years ago, having come here from New York city. Mr. Somarindyck was a visitor to the International Typographical Union convention at Toronto, being an ex-delegate. He represented No. 55 at the Milwaukee convention. He is a Sioux City (Iowa) boy, and has been employed in the government printing office at Washington.

Lyman Bros. and F. H. Johnson have moved their printing offices to Pearl street.

Charles ("Kid") Bowman, of Cleveland, Ohio, formerly of the old Syracuse Courier, greeted old friends and formed new ones here during the month of August. He left here nearly twenty years ago and has been in Cleveland since. In appearance he has not changed a great deal, and his former sunny disposition still remains with him. He found many changes here and few of the old-time prints, but he managed to glide through the giddy whirl of pleasure with the ease and grace characteristic of his younger years in old Syracuse.

Nelse Doggett, Bill (Giveadam) Jones, Ben Woods, H. C. Stimson, Pete Leonard have all left here lately, after a more or less extended sojourn.

MONTGOMERY, ALA.

W. S. Barnes, one of the fastest and best machinist-operators in the south, who has been on state work here for the past four years, left Tuesday morning for Los Angeles, Cal. During Mr. Barnes' residence in Montgomery he served three terms as president of No. 222, and was one of the most conscientious and energetic workers for the cause of unionism in the city.

One case of yellow fever in the city has made printers scarce, and the small job offices are borrowing men from each other to get out the jobs on hand. Present prospects are that all the printers will soon have a vacation; if a few more cases of fever develop there will be "nothing doing" until frost comes.

The announcement in the current JOURNAL of the death of W. W. Holt was a shock to his old-time friends in this city. Appreciation of his worth as a printer and a man was not confined to his home town, Mobile, as every person who was acquainted with him recognized his sterling qualities.

NEWBURGH, N. Y.

Newburgh has a morning paper once more. There has been no morning paper here since the Press failed about a year ago. On July 31 the Register, which has for the past twenty-eight years been issued as an evening paper, appeared as a seven-column, eight-page morning paper. Heretofore it was a nine-column, four-page blanket sheet. The change is a great improvement, and a very creditable paper is being published. Among the mechanical additions to the plant is a new Mergenthaler linotype machine, making two now in use. A. D. Moffat is editor and manager. J. F. Tucker has charge of the city department, a position he has held for about twenty-one years. He is assisted by E. P. Dunphy. The Register receives the morning report of the Publishers' Press Association. The Register ought to succeed in its new venture, as it has an open field before it.

For the first time in several years No. 305 was represented at the International Typographical Union convention. Edward J. O'Donnell was the delegate.

There was a fair attendance at the August meetting, when the new scale was brought up for consideration. Only a few changes from the scale signed two years ago have been made so far. The present scale expires October 1.

The new hall to be used by No. 8 for its future meetings, located in a church building at Grand and Finney avenues, which has been converted into a set of halls, with committee rooms, etc., should prove a decided incentive to increased attendance. The place used for years, Walhalla, had become entirely inadequate in all respects. The new hall is ideal from every standpoint. The change from Walhalla to Hibernian Hall is not regarded as likely to give the Irish any edge.

The loyalty of No. 8's members to those who may become incapacitated to earn a livelihood was recently well demonstrated by the contribution by chapels of $146.75, in addition to $25 voted by the union, to aid an unfortunate brother.

The Chicago ex-delegates' association favored St. Louis delegates and visitors with invitations to their entertainment for August 10. There is no doubt that those going via Chicago had a fine day as guests of No. 16.

It was a new galley boy who referred to the proofroom as the "house of correction."

At its August meeting No. 8 ordered its appropriation to the Cummings memorial fund ($250) increased to 50 cents per capita.

A lockout of members of No. 8 occurred at the Inland Type Foundry on July 14, occasioned by the refusal of a non-unionist, whom the firm had employed, to apply for admission to the union and the foundry's rejection of No. 8's demand to discharge him. The officers have endeavored to effect an amicable agreement, but the management declare their purpose to run an "open" shop. One peculiar result of the trouble is that the non-unionist refused to go to work when the lockout occurred. Members and friends of No. 8 have been large consumers of the Inland's products, and will now try to bump along without them. No. 8 has declared a boycott on the Inland Type Foundry.

The cheering news comes from 'Frisco that the battle is won. The shipment of men which was to have left here August 3 (several "all-right" ones included) was called off.

Changes and alterations being made in the composing room of a local daily have had as one result the removal of the proofroom to an elevation forming the top of the elevator shaft. A heated argument between some of the readers as to choice of locations causes the office wits to refer to the incident as the "mutiny of the poop deck."

They are *still advertising in St. Louis papers for non-union compositors to go to 'Frisco.

Farmers' unions have been organized in Texas to the number of 6,780. The Arkansas farmers' unions held a convention at Little Rock in August. In the latter state there are 1,600 locals, with a total membership of 65,000. A national convention will be held at Texarkana September 7.

An artist on a local daily was inspired by the tide of immigration to evolve a picture on the subject, showing Uncle Sam and Miss Columbia watching the billows rolling in, on the crests of which were pictured the faces of all nationalities, all joining in the refrain "America!" The effort is headed "The (Record) Breakers." Also, strike breakers.

All the union musicians of St. Louis merged into one band and led the march from the old to the new headquarters on moving day, August 11.

The "new paper" rumor is being bruited about—again. Has at least nine lives.

A member of the legislative committee of the Missouri Federation of Labor recently called on the governor of the state, and in the course of conversation remarked that union labor had 50,000 votes in this commonwealth. Quick as lightning came the retort: "Why don't you use it?" Aye, why? Better than the Labor day parade, union label—even organization itself—is this same sacred right of suffrage, if we were organized politically as we are industrially. Forget about being democrats or republicans, and vote solid for labor—for your bread and butter. Then will be solved the child labor, sweat shop, citizens' alliance and all the train of attendant evils which separates the producer from a just share in the fruits of his labor.

GOD'S OWN COUNTRY—AGAIN.

My letter in the July Journal was not sufficiently clear. It has created an idea that Melbourne is a long way behind the times. Several indignant correspondents, eager to uphold Australian prestige, have accused me of being a "knocker." Such was furthest from my intention, and I am sorry such an impression was produced.

The zoological collection at Royal Park, Melbourne, is far larger and finer than anything I have seen since leaving home. A public library containing many thousands of volumes, a technological museum, and an art gallery that any city in the United States might well be proud of, containing the original works of such masters as Tadema, Leighton, Millais, Reynolds and Watts among its collection, are features which denote the high tone of thought of a large section of the people. The Exhibition building is one of Melbourne's proudest possessions. In its vast hall is seating accommodation for over 20,000 persons. From the dome can be obtained an unexcelled view of the marvelous city of the south. Surrounding the building are beautiful gardens with all descriptions of brilliant flowers, and the musical voices of never-ceasing fountains lend an air of peacefulness to these glorious spring days.

It is here that the aquarium, with its performing seals and immense collection of sea denizens from every quarter of the globe, provides a fund of education and good-humored enjoyment.

Francis Ormonde founded the Workingmen's College over a dozen years ago. Now thousands of ambitious young fellows and hundreds of their progressive sisters pass through each year. The list of subjects taught is varied and numerous—electricity, engineering, architecture, drawing, painting, cooking, dressmaking being but a few. The class in letterpress printing is one of the most successful. The fees are low, and the instruction good.

Musically and dramatically an Australian audience is excellently informed and highly critical. Ask any theatrical manager or "star" promoter.

Situated practically on the seacoast, the opportunities for surf bathing are many. Nearly all through the year this form of recreation is possible.

The antipodeans are still interested in—or, rather, enthused over—bicycle racing. Only last season at one meeting 30,000 people assembled. A vast number of wheels are ridden. The auto is increasing. In all branches of sport the "gumsucker" has predominated. The climate is conducive to excellence in outdoor recreative exercises.

Education in Melbourne is free and compulsory. A child may leave school at any age after procuring a certificate of certain proficiency. Scholarships are competed for in the state schools, the possession of which entitles the holder to three years' gratuitous instruction in a college. From there the transition to the university is easy if there are sufficient financial aids at home.

Port Jackson, as Sydney harbor is called, is conceded by travelers who have visited Rio de Janeiro to be the finest in the world. Enter at evening, just as the sun is sinking, and you will behold one of the most entrancing sights the eye ever dwelt on. The city of Sydney, with a population of over 400,000, has some of the most beautiful watering places within easy car rides that one could desire. It abounds in pretty nooks and picnic spots. The electric car system is modeled on the latest plan, and is speedy and safe. The Blue Mountains and the Jenolan caves, famous among travelers, are visited yearly by thousands of tourists.

One of the most incisive journals on earth is the Sydney Bulletin, renowned for the grand work it has done in elevating Australian literature and art to its present high standard. Every one interested in black and white has heard of "Hop," their famous caricaturist.

I referred to the few papers Melbourne publishes. And I still consider that with her population of brainy, intelligent citizens she could do with two additional journals very easily.

Not many miles away from the metropolis of the south is the green, fertile Gippsland Valley. Trees equaling those found in the Yosemite both in height and girth are here, but the world doesn't hear of it because, as I said before, we don't advertise ourselves enough.

Australia headed the gold production list for 1903 with 4,315,538 ounces, valued at $89,210,100. Much of this immense sum was realized from the famous Bendigo goldfields, 100 miles from Melbourne. From the backs of millions of sheep is taken the famous Australian wool, worn all over the world.

There is an electric car service in Perth, practically a new city in Western Australia. Thousands of daring miners passed through there some years since to the renowned Coolgardie and Kalgoorlie goldfields.

Comparisons are odious; I know it. But I was in Colorado at the time of the last presidential election. The difference in politics was startling. Every reader is acquainted with the tactics of the opposing parties in the Peabody-Adams fight, so I will merely add that such a condition in Australia at the present time is an absolute impossibility. There we are free from the ward "boss," the two-sided labor "leader," the corrupt politician, the practice of ballot-box stuffing and the other things which have brought contempt on democracy as practiced in the United States. We are not so "progressive."

Among Australians, as among many other nations, are men who anxiously, yet hopefully, look for a rising up of the higher intelligence of the American people, and the wiping out of these great drawbacks to progress—corruption in politics and the trusts. Several persons have had interesting correspondence with me on this theme. But they are the cosmopolitans, whose views are not confined to a single city, or state, or nation. Their mental horizon is wider.

A feature of life over here that I can not reconcile myself to is the apartment house. Life is altered—one might say deranged—by its limitations and falsities. The people are forceful and brusk. The little politenesses one meets with in other countries are missing. Underneath, however, are the warmth of heart and constancy of friendship. My experience right along proves this.

America is a great country. It seems a pity that one can not do a little "boosting" in his own way without being accused by his fellow countrymen of "knocking" his own.

Many Americans with whom I have chatted have the idea that Australia is under the ban of a tyrannical monarchy. Nothing could be farther from the truth. For, although nominally under the British crown, the country is practically self-governing, the prime minister and parliaments of the commonwealth and premiers and representatives of all the states being elected by the people. And even were we under direct British rule it could never be said we were tyrannized. The Union

Jack has always waved for freedom, even though the nation has sometimes made mistakes.

A governor in Australia is the direct antithesis of his American namesake. All the power of office is vested in the premier. Most of his excellency the governor's time is devoted to presiding at social functions, opening bazaars, presenting prizes, etc.

The Melbourne police force, fire department and other public officials are a fine body of men. Politics are never allowed to interfere with ability. The competent man need never fear which party is in power. His position is secure.

In my last letter I gave certain facts—which I can absolutely vouch for if need be—about the printing trade. They were certainly not eulogistic. The truth seldom is. But some readers have gathered erroneous ideas of the country, as a whole, from my comment on one trade. This was not my idea in writing.

Quite an extensive amount of shipping passes through the different ports of Australia in a year. Melbourne is said to possess one of the largest docks in the world.

Once the terrible infliction of the drought is overcome Australia will go ahead with leaps and bounds. She hardly gets comfortably at work now when the whole country is visited by the dread enemy of the farmer, and the progress of the nation is temporarily paralyzed.

With increase of population opportunities will become more numerous, and the incentive to hustle will be greater. Then this great land will take her place among the nations. Even now one can enjoy liberty of conscience, freedom in business, and that immunity from interference so dear to the heart of the Anglo-Saxon in the sunny land across the sea.

WASHINGTON, PA.

J. Tracy, otherwise known as "Jack," lately of Jacksonville, Fla., was a visitor to our little city last month, made a call upon ye correspondent and went on eastward with "Michael" McVickars.

The Daily Record of July 27 says (all of which is true) in regard to our coming Labor day: "The present indications are that the celebration will be a great success, and elaborate preparations are being made." Two-colored posters have been received from the Morrison Printing Company of Detroit, Mich., and the town will be billed "for fair."

Typographical Union No. 456 has certainly got representation in Washington's Central Trades Assembly. L. W. Rank, from the Observer job rooms, is acting as the assembly's president, and your "advocater" was appointed "sec." some two moons ago.

This from a local paper will show how we do things in "Little" Washington when it comes down to Labor day: "For Labor day the Washington Central Trades Assembly has had some fine posters, in two colors, printed that are quite decorative. The same will be distributed about the city to the business houses, which, the assembly expects, will extend the privilege of hanging the posters in the different windows. The design of the bill is quite appropriate, and would enhance instead of disfigure any window. Tickets to the number of 2,000 have been printed also—all numbered, no duplicates. These tickets will sell for 10 cents each."

The new daily paper here (the Morning Record) carries the "little joker" high up on its masthead.

By the recent dinner of the London Association of Correctors of the Press, over which Anthony Hope presides, attention was called to a queer custom of the old time. Printers used to chain copies of their books outside their offices, and if any passing scholar detected an error he was rewarded according to its magnitude—a cup of wine for a broken letter, a cup of wine and a plate of beef for a turned letter, and the like.

A "brand new" paper in every particular—ad and body type of eight-point caliber—has made its advent in our county field at California, on the Monongahela. This thriving little town now has two hand-set papers, and this latest one, the Weekly Independent, is bright, clean and newsy, and shows much strength in typographical get-up.

The Canonsburg Daily Notes (seven miles from here) has both a Mergenthaler and a Simplex in the news room. Their new quarters are well appointed and the job room is worthy of mention as to light, air, etc.

WILLIAM CLARK BLACK.

AUGUSTA, ME.

At a special meeting of No. 380, held Saturday evening, July 29, the union was addressed by Charles T. Scott, on the importance of organizing in preparation for the coming movement for eight hours, otherwise known as the "shorter workday."

The night was one of the hottest we have had during July, but two-thirds of the members, including women and people who are non-union, braved the heat and listened for nearly an hour and a half to Organizer Scott, who pointed out to them the attitude of the International Typographical Union on the eight-hour question, the dodging and evading tactics employed by the National Typothetæ, and then wound up his splendid speech with an appeal for us to organize up to the 100 per cent basis.

He was given an ovation at its conclusion, also a rising vote of thanks, and the only wish of the members of No. 380 is that President Lynch will keep Organizer Scott in Maine as much as possible, for he certainly has got the "goods," and knows how to impress them upon his listeners.

The movement certainly looks bright here and more especially so during the past month, the members are commencing to talk more and more about it, and a good illustration of this fact is that seven new applications are ready to be acted upon, and more to follow.

The International Typographical Union members in the state of Maine certainly took their share of offices at the state federation recently held in Bangor: Ex-President Brown, of No. 380, was reelected secretary-treasurer; John F. Connelly, of No. 446, corresponding secretary; L. V. Clark, of No. 380, finance committee; James A. Brennan, of No. 380, legislative committee. They also had the state federation pass resolutions favorable to the eight-hour movement.

The whole talk of the "typos" is for the "shorter workday," and the other labor bodies are ready to do anything in their power to help the movement along.

Let us have more "Scott" and we will trim the Sturgis Commission a mile, the 1st day of January, 1906.

JAMES A. BRENNAN.

A SUGGESTION.

With the nearing of the date when a national demand for the eight-hour day is to be made, it seems to me that every effort and every idea that may have even a remote possibility of aiding our cause should be utilized. This belief, together with an earnest desire for success, are the sole reasons for presenting the following suggestions:

In the war of capital against labor the advantage has too often been found on the side of money; only one thing can hope to cope with any degree of success with the money power, and that is a practical application of superior intelligence. Too often, in the struggle of the worker for a living wage under righteous conditions, the capitalist has come off victorious by serenely closing his place of business until such time as an empty stomach shall have forced capitulation on the part of the worker.

All unions have recognized this source of weakness and have tried to overcome the difficulty through the creation of a "defense fund," with greater or lesser—and often lesser—degree of success.

Now, why should not the International Typographical Union take an advance step in its fight with the typothetæ and meet it on its own ground? Instead of spending thousands of dollars in support of men idle on strike, from a rapidly diminishing defense fund, I suggest the possibility (at least for the stronger unions) of entering into direct competition with the typothetæ with fully equipped offices, which, rightly managed, will not only give employment to union men, but will demonstrate to the public at large the possibility of an eight-hour day at an insignificant minimum increase in the cost of production.

Union No. 13 paid out nearly $40,000 during our "late unpleasantness"—enough to have established an office, put union men to work, met the typothetæ in direct competition, which, with an abundance of free advertising in the way of news and the sympathy of an unprejudiced public for a conservative union, would have proved a mighty factor in determining a favorable outcome.

The linotype and the monotype people would be only too glad to enter into negotiations for their part of the equipment.

It is not my purpose to enter into detail, but simply contribute for discussion the above suggestions should merit be found therein.

Braintree, Mass. MYRON M. ADAMS.

THE TRUE SPIRIT OF UNIONISM.

Looking over the May number of the Inland Printer I saw an article on "The True Spirit of Unionism," and it called to my mind an instance where I thought that true unionism was displayed. Last January the Vermont Watchman Company was burnt out; there was not so much damage done by fire as by water, as the fire companies could not get at the fire very readily, consequently there was more water thrown than ordinarily would be necessary. We had two Simplex machines, which were thrown out of commission. The fire occurred at midnight, and the firemen flooded the whole building. It was in January and twenty below zero, so you can imagine what it looked like the next morning; everything frozen up with about five or six inches of ice over everything. Mr. Ropes, the proprietor, was sick in bed at the time, and after the fire was all out the reporters, local editors and myself went down to his house and had a council of war. He said: "Boys! we have got to get out some kind of a sheet." That was enough. We left him and we got together and planned out our work for the next day, after which we went home and got a couple of hours' rest, having worked most all night carrying things out of the office into the next building. The next morning we tried to get help from the other offices, but could not get much, only from a small job office owned by Dean Edson, who threw open his doors and told us to use anything he had. The men all showed up the next morning and started in with a will when we told them that we wanted to get out a paper; some of them got hot water and thawed out the ads, others went to setting at the case, others carried material over to Mr. Edson's, while others chopped out column rules and galleys, etc., out of the ice. I had all I could do to get up steam and look out and direct things generally. I left everything in regard to the paper to the rest of the men and told them to go ahead and do the best they could while I got to work getting the building cleaned up and thawing out the presses. The outcome of it all was that we did not lose an edition of the Daily Journal; certainly it was not full size, but it was a paper to be proud of under the circumstances—six columns, four pages the first day and six columns, six pages after, until in eight days we were running our full-size paper, eight columns, four pages, twenty-two inches long, on our own presses, which I had got into shape.

Digitized by Google

The only outside help being one man, who helped me wipe up the presses and clean up generally. Now, the point which I think was "true unionism" was that the men went through all this and stood by one another, helping one another where they saw they were most needed, and doing everything to gain the one thing, that being to "get out a paper of some kind," and all this was done with the weather twenty below zero and the men working in ice and snow and dirt, not knowing whether they were going to catch their death of cold, and not seeming to care so long as they got the sheet out. After the forms had gone to press they all turned to, and folded the paper by hand, and all this was done without extra charge, and goes to show that true union help, which can work together for its employer's interest, should be appreciated, and I think it was in this case, for I know that Mr. Ropes could not mention it afterward without tears coming into his eyes, and he could never say what I know he felt, and was not in a position financially to show it. Hoping this will be a lesson to some employers who are standing out against giving their men a favor, as I am sure that anything that we wanted we could have obtained had Mr. Ropes lived, though he was a hard man to talk to on union principles, but I think that he, like lots of others, have found out that union men can be relied upon to stand by their employer if he is half-decent to them and meets them half-way.

Montpelier, Vt. GEORGE T. ARCHER.

SHOULD UNIONS ENTER POLITICS?

The labor union is distinctively a business institution. It is organized for the advancement of the economic interests of its members. It is a weapon of war. It exists because justice does not rule in the land of its existence. If justice ruled there would be no need of the labor union. Injustice rules because of the presence of bad laws. Bad laws are enacted by politicians who owe no allegiance to any but the power that makes them. They fear no master save he who has dominion over them. And the only weapon over them is organization.

Every wrong against which labor is organized and forced to make war, is an economic wrong due to the presence of unjust statutes. Our contest with our employers is but a superficial one. We only contest with him, not because he is our real antagonist, but because we do not see the real foe. Our real foe is an economic system that forces unholy alliances between natural enemies, and antagonisms among those who should be friends. Until we have these truths well fixed in our minds we shall continue to wage a useless warfare.

Though our real foe is the system, yet the system is represented by men. These men are strongly organized to perpetuate the system. They make the laws we are bound to obey. We enact trade regulations which, in our absurd conception of our strength, we imagine our foe must accede to. Having the power of government in his hands, he enacts statutes that nullify every regulation we succeed in having him accede to. And he has the power of using the militia to frighten us from doing anything should we grow desperate in our helplessness.

Until we learn the power that lies in government; until we appreciate the value of taking some part in the enactment of law under which we are obliged to live; until we study the natural laws of economics, and understand their necessary relation to our material welfare, every victory we secure will prove to be but the "baseless fabric of a vision."

If our foe is fully organized, and uses such potent power as lies in government and law for his extension of power over us, why is it not wise for us to counter his efforts with at least enough action to preserve our natural rights? If political action is wise for him, why is it unwise for us?

We should be careful about endorsing mere candidates. The individual official is not so much the thing that concerns us, as the principles of statute law under which we must live. We should first seek to understand our true economic interests, and see that they are enacted into law. The support of particular candidates should be incidental to that. If we truly understand the natural laws of economics, and adapt our measures to them, our enactments will not only be to our interests, but to all the true interests of all men. We can not permanently prosper by any unjust enactments, any more than can our foe.

Let those who oppose unions entering into the arena of politics look backward a bit. Let them witness the Australian ballot; child labor laws; regulations of hours and safety appliances of every kind, and the innumerable acts that were forced upon our statute books by organized labor, and then ask himself if the past has not shown the advantage of unions entering politics. Every permanent benefit we have gained in the past has been gained by political action, and nothing else. Let us continue. Until we do menace our foe by united political action, he will but smile at all our silly efforts to overpower him.

JERSEY CITY, N. J.

Kenneth M. Forbes, the popular secretary of No. 94, is one of the many good union men of this city and state. Mr. Forbes is energetic and always on the alert. Born in Toronto, Canada, July 23, 1872, he came to New York city when only five years of age. He became a member of the union, joining "Big 6," shortly afterward bringing his card to Jersey City. Mr. Forbes has always taken an active interest in the union and has served on several important committees both in Jersey City and Hoboken, of the latter of which he was president, and while serving in such capacity organized Typographical Union Label League, which comprised locals No. 94, 110 and 323, said organization being very successful in introducing the "little joker." Mr. Forbes has served as one of the organizers of the central labor union, and has at different times represented either No. 94 or 323 in this body. Mr. Forbes has on several occasions represented his union at the conventions of the New Jersey State Federation of Labor. He is now serving his second term as secretary of No. 94 and is a very proficient officer. Mr. Forbes represented No. 94 at the recent Toronto convention.

NOTES.

Roy Leonard has deposited a Detroit card, and Patrick Byrne a New York card.

Secretary Forbes reported at August meeting 123 members, seventeen in arrears.

President Rice has appointed Fred N. Cornell a member of the executive board in place of John Wells, who has taken a traveling card and is working "over the pond."

The executive board was given power, at the last meeting of No. 94, to invite the state eight-hour committee to favor Jersey City with one of its meetings.

Peter Graham, a prominent member of No. 94, was recently elected chief ranger of one of the local courts of Foresters.

John S. Fisher, Allan Ball and Fred N. Cornell represented No. 94 at the state eight-hour committee recently held at Atlantic City.

SIOUX FALLS, S. D.

In reading THE JOURNAL we note the victory achieved by the typos of 'Frisco and it is certainly a notable victory, as a city the size of San Francisco uses a large body of printers. This battle, which was a short one, was looked upon by the typothetæ as the opening gun of the big domain of Uncle Sam, and it must certainly grind on some, notably Parry, to see what result was accomplished by the movement. The outcome of this strike will be a talisman for nearly all and is the greatest boom to our cause that has arisen as yet.

Right here in South Dakota we have a man who is doing his share of work toward the eight-hour movement. The one we refer to is J. E. Fancher, organizer for South Dakota. A man who has gone through a number of strikes; cool, deliberate and thoroughly conversant upon all points of unionism and who has a faculty of never arousing the enmity of the proprietors is Fancher. This state has only five organized typographical unions and a good many towns to compete with the unionized places and the bosses contend that with eight hours for a schedule they can not compete with the other places. Mr. Fancher is certainly rounding up these tardy places and doing more for the welfare of our cause than one thinks. He certainly has the good wishes of No. 218, of which he is a member.

Labor day is to be the event of the season here and the program has been arranged and the local committees are hustling already to make it an event long to be remembered. They have secured an orator of wide renown to deliver the address of the day and he will be ably assisted by local talent.

THE JOURNAL grows better every issue and the last one was a winner.

Work is fair, but nothing extra doing.

W. P. DAVIS.

THE ORIGIN OF BAER'S "DIVINE RIGHT."

For many years I have been in the habit of going into second-hand book stores whenever the profit of previous labor had accumulated to an extent sufficient to enable me to part with a portion of circulating capital without pressing danger of having to tax my fixed capital or infringe upon my sinking fund in order to declare a dividend which should enable me to purchase a meal ticket in the open market, and I had about concluded that I had been yearning for the unattainable when, a few days ago, I drifted wearily into a second-hand book capitalist's institution and approached the clerk with the old, old question, "Have you anything humorous in political economy?"

The clerk smiled radiantly as he took me by the coat lapel and said, "Prepare yourself. It is a long lane that has no turning; also, the darkest hour is just before the dawning; too, the darkest cloud may have a silver lining; too and also, behind the hills the sun is always shining." After having said these things he led me, gently, back through the dim aisles of musty-smelling books to the dimmest aisle of mustiest books, and there, in the section devoted to political economy, glowing like a cigarette in a murky fog, I found it, "The Political Economy of Humanism," by Henry Wood.

I seized it and started for the light. The clerk followed me closely, because the light is near the door and the door is not closed. The book fell open at page 25, and I knew that my long search was ended.

"How much?" I said, controlling my emotion as best I could.

"Thirty cents," said the clerk.

With feverish haste I transferred the circulating capital and took the object of demand to my room. I wanted to be alone with my treasure.

Political economy is no longer "the dismal science." On page 25, under "Supply and Demand," Mr. Wood writes: "Supply is positive and demand negative."

What a picture that brings before the mind's eye! Far in the south there lies a fence; on one side lies a watermelon—a supply; on the other side lies a long, dark man—a demand. One can almost see that positive supply tugging and straining at its vine, growling, gnashing its teeth in passionate yearning to get over the fence and eat the long, dark man, who is negative demand! The scene is too horrible! One can not help feeling that eventually the watermelon will tear itself loose from the vine, climb over the fence, and there do bloody deeds.

Again: Charlie Ross, an innocent demand for something to eat, goes forth. His little feet carry him aimlessly on until, all unwary, he stops beside an orchard wall above which swings an apple on a branch—a supply. Charlie would like the apple; but, demand being negative, he doesn't care for it. He gazes at it idly, attracted, perhaps, by its physical beauty. But behold the apple, the positive supply! The blossom end begins to vibrate, to tremble, to open and shut like an animated rubber tobacco bag! The branch sways, it bends; the writhing of the blossom end fascinates Charlie; he moves not! Lower and lower the positive supply of apple drops until at last, with one fell swoop, the expanding blossom end opens and envelops Charlie, the poor, negative demand!

But man can only learn from experience, and from this at last we learn, not only how Charlie Ross was lost, but how worms get into apples.

Over on page 26 another fact is noted in relation to supply and demand: "Throughout the whole cosmic economy each of these factors is not only incomplete without the other, but each is evidence of the existence of the other." This shows quite plainly that a demand for a slice of green cheese from the moon is ample evidence that a supply of such green cheese exists. It is a clear and perfect refutation of the statement made by the thoughtless that the moon is not made in whole or in part of green cheese.

On page 31 the laboring man may begin to take hope. "The almost or quite 100 per cent advance in average wages which has been made during the last thirty years, in spite of the immense immigration into the country, is a natural advance, and was caused by an excess of demand. If the forcing process had been continually applied during that period the advance would have been much less marked, for the reason that the demand would have been injured."

The book was written in 1894 (page numbers here quoted from edition of 1901). In the thirty years preceding 1894 labor unions grew from a total membership of about 100,000 in 1864 to almost 2,000,000 in 1894, and in not 1 per cent. of the cases where a raise in wages to any number of men was given was the gain made without concerted action by a union of employes. Evidently the "excess of demand" referred to in the quoted paragraph was made by the unions for higher wages.

On page 40 we learn that "the combined labor unions of the world can not permanently lift wages above their natural value." Only a true humorist could say "an undisputed thing in such a solemn way." Most unionists will be content when they get wages up to their natural value.

All through the book the laborer is told he must rely on "natural law." On page 13 one discovers that "natural law is never suspended or repealed by any force which can be exerted on the same plane; but it is axiomatic that a higher law may overcome a lower one," which indicates that there are two "natural" laws. On page 68 one discovers that "it is at once apparent that so far as any commodity or service is exempt from general competition, it is not fully amenable to natural law."

First we have a general statement of natural law, then a statement that there is or may be a higher law than natural law, then a statement that any combination able to prevent general competition is higher than natural law. Evidently we have no further use for the Deity, since we can by stopping competition repeal natural laws by higher laws. This book must be Baer's bible; it gives him divine right and makes him superior to God inasmuch as he can prevent competition; and "it is at once apparent" that Henry Wood is his prophet, and these are Parry's articles of faith.

The whole universe, according to Mr. Wood, is based on this natural law, which may be repealed at any time by a sufficiently strong combination of physical capital.

As if this discovery were not sufficient to set the world running smoothly Mr. Wood, on page 37, says: "It is deplorable that competition sometimes causes seamstresses to live in garrets and make shirts at starvation prices; but it should not be forgotten that for each one of these a hundred poor people, as a consequence, buy their shirts cheaply."

And "it is at once apparent" that cheapness justifies all things. Therefore, when the beef trust has raised the price of meat we have a right to go to an orphan asylum, select a nice, fat orphan and cook it for Sunday dinner. It may be a little rough on the orphan, "but it should not be forgotten that for each of these" a dozen poor people, as a consequence, may get their Sunday dinner cheaply. It is natural law. If the orphans should strike, we have our remedy. Mr. Wood has guarded his proposition at all points. On page 81 we are told that "strikes are violent efforts to defy natural law, and are, therefore, harmful and expensive." "It is at once apparent" that we have a perfect right to eat orphans. If the orphans go on a strike we must get an injunction and call out the militia.

On page 285 we are told that "all human infelicity, whether physical, social, economic, moral or spiritual, comes from a disregard or violation of the established order." And "it is at once apparent" that Judas Iscariot did his duty to his God and his fellow man when he betrayed Christ, since Christ, when he fired the money changers from the temple, violated established order; besides which he did several other things objected to by those whose visible interests lay in the perpetuation of the established order. Also, as we can not improve anything without changing something, any improvement, being a violation of established order, is opposed to natural law.

On page 286 we discover that "law is only a comprehensive name for the orderly methods of the Creator." He refers to natural law, and "it is at once apparent" that as soon as a corner in any sort of commodity exempts that commodity from "general competition" those persons who form the corner are superior to the Creator, because, as previously stated, the commodity "is not fully amenable to natural law."

On page 295 we find that "intellectual logic is inadequate to the delicate interpretation of natural law, and 'of' its articulated adjustment to human affairs." The unnecessary preposition appears to be a part of natural law, since the intellectual logic of grammarians prohibits such use of it.

It is strange, however, that Mr. Wood should have noted the inadequacy of intellectual logic on page 295 after having, on page 292, said: "Mind being as amenable to law as matter, political economy is an exact science."

This may appear rather idiotic than funny, but that is on account of your fault-finding nature.

Digitized by Google

Just look again on page 295. "Intuition alone is able to put its ear to the ground and distinguish between discordant, even though faint jars, and concordant vibrations."

There are 309 pages of "The Political Economy of Humanism," each one more ridiculously funny than its predecessor. On page 165, for instance, speaking of labor organizations, he says: "If, therefore, a number of carpenters organize an artificial combination which holds them together, it is in direct opposition to the law of natural competition." On page 240, speaking of business organizations, he says: "Organization as manifested ON EVERY PLANE is characterized by force and utility. It is omnipresent in the physical world, erecting and cementing unities out of the most diverse materials."

A comparison of the two statements develops the real purpose of the book. It is intended to produce laughter. This is proved by the statement on page 274. "Through a virtual monopoly of all the principal industrial trades and handicrafts by the unions, which are controlled and almost entirely composed of the foreign-born, the American boy has come to be almost a superfluity." In our own union the percentage of foreign-born is less than 1, in the machinists' about 10, carpenters' about 15, bricklayers' about 10; other trades in proportion, except where unions have been compelled to take in strikebreakers, as has so many times happened with miners.

There is plenty of material for a comic opera in the book, or at least for an operatic comedy. The element of solemn fooling shows in every page. It is a caricature of reasoning. Not only that, however, gives it value; it shows to the student of logic how easily a man may deceive himself by neglecting definitions, overlooking connotations, and borrowing phrases without analyzing them. It "hears to me" like a sermon on labor by N. D. Hillis. M. H. BATTENBERG.

THE SOLUTION OF THE LABOR PROBLEM.

We read a great deal these days from the lectures of professors and the orations of the graduates of the relations of capital and labor and how this question should be and how they imagine it will be solved. It seems that the solution must come from the individual workers themselves; that is, those who depend upon their weekly wage for a living. They should think, and watch the march of events and meditate on what is the better way to lend their individual effort to contribute their share for its well being. Now, how are we trying to reason this question out with ourselves? Is it by discussing the question who is the greater general, Oyama or Kuropatkin, or who discovered the spit ball? Will it be by thinking what will happen when the age limit for the worker is set at forty-five and we become candidates for Dr. Osler's chloroform club at sixty, that the question reaches that stage which will satisfy us all?

We are told that turning our attention to men who are candidates for offices, and electing the friendly ones, will bring about a satisfactory result. We will take the results recently in Massachusetts in this line. A very active campaign was made against the republican candidate for governor who vetoed a labor bill that passed both branches of the legislature, and he was defeated. A man was elected governor who, it is expected, would have signed the bill, and it was presented again this year, but it was killed by the senate. And still the bill is no nearer becoming a law than it was many years ago. The chances may be that this thing would be repeated year after year, either the legislators killing the labor bills or the governor vetoing them. This has brought about the calling of a conference in the state of representatives from all central labor unions to see whether the unions can strengthen themselves by taking part in politics. This will be watched with interest. Take it in the state of New York. The ten-hour bill for bakers being passed and signed by the governor is declared unconstitutional by the highest tribunal in the government by a single vote. That decision by the supreme court gave the people the best opportunity to think and know just where they are at. So any concessions for shorter hours will have to be brought about by agreements with employers, or strikes; the former to be hoped for, the latter avoided.

The securing of shorter hours and increases in wages in most all cases remain a fixed policy whether the workers, through their unions, cease to be active, as in many cases they lose interest after these have been accomplished. This is another example of the lack of thought on the part of those most directly interested, as to what might happen in case a general reaction takes place in the trade union movement and the whole campaign of years of hard work carried on all over again. A look at the results of the most important strikes of the year shows the many failures of that method. After a struggle of weeks and months they had to return, what were left of them, at the same demands that were offered to them at first. With very few exceptions all efforts to revive these unions have proved useless, and some have entirely gone out of existence. Mistakes will be made just as long as there are men to make them, but it is about time that they should think how to profit by the mistakes of the past. No union enters into a contest expecting to lose, but they do not deliberate on the outcome if the effort is lost and the disaster that it will bring.

By each individual giving a little time and thought to the question and all individuals working unitedly what an amount of good could be accomplished. To be successful in anything some little sacrifices must be made, and this is true in the labor question. In labor unions as in other organizations all the sacrificing is done by the few, while the many are always ready to criticize. You are not doing your part by staying away from the meetings or becoming disinterested in the important matters that are always before your union; you are not doing your part by asking a member who attends the meetings and then kicking because it wasn't done the other way and saying what you would do if you were at the meeting, and how you would make So and So look like 30 cents; you are not doing your part when you fail to record your vote for the best men for union officers. And many other things you fail to do that will help wonderfully to lighten the burden of those who are always willing to do more than their share, and add to the good government of your union. Stand up and touch elbows with the next man and try and do your share of the work the best you can. Individual effort and united individuals is the proper formation in which to advance. P. H. BELLINGHAM, WASH.

There is another machine in Bellingham. The Herald installed another during the past month, making in all nine machines in the city, all working one shift each, regularly, and some of them two shifts.

At our last meeting it was decided to form a woman's auxiliary to the union, not that we are jealous of Tacoma and Seattle and the good times they have, but because we believed we could better push the label. There don't seem to be much enthusiasm on the part of our employers in the job offices over the label. They never use the label unless it be compulsory, which is due to the lack of agitation. So, we believe, with an auxiliary and a proper canvass we will bring those who have printing to do to realize the benefit they will derive therefrom, and also cause the proprietor-owners and other shops to pay more attention to our union and its workings than to literature they receive from the alleged organization, typothetæ (apropos San Francisco). AS TO LABOR DAY PARADES.

Annually, when the summer months advance, discussion of the question, Shall we parade? becomes acute.

Annually, the indifference of unions which have formerly neglected to parade, becomes more marked.

Annually, the estrangement and bitterness increase between the unions which parade and those who do not.

Year by year the ranks show a larger proportion of men and organizations new to the labor movement.

Every year the absence of the "kid glove aristocrats" of the labor movement is more and more noticeable.

These conditions are an element of weakness and a growing menace.

The advice of St. Paul, "Forsake not the assembling of yourselves together," is as applicable to trade unions today as to the Christian church.

Habitual absence from parades and meetings breeds a dry rot that paralyzes activity, deadens enthusiasm and renders the union's efforts ineffective. The work of the organization is thrown upon the shoulders of a few and proves too great a burden.

For unions with labels to lose such a chance for publicity as is offered by a Labor day parade seems almost suicidal blindness. In the streets on that day are thousands of active supporters of labor's cause, and tens of thousands of friendly observers throng the walks. Eager eyes watch for every attractive display, and banners, mottoes and uniforms impress themselves deeply on the popular mind. Thousands of dollars could not buy the value in advertising that is lost by laziness on Labor day.

An increasing danger also confronts unions having labels whose members neglect to parade.

Other unions neglect the labels.

They have good reason. The most effective way they have of showing their strength to employers, non-members and the general public is by turning out on Labor day with as many fellow unionists as they can muster. If label unionists neglect them on that day, they have some justification for neglect of labels on other days.

There is no good reason for refusing to parade. No more beneficent organization exists than the trade union. Its achievements are just cause for pride. Millions of dollars are pouring every week into the homes of the poor as the result of its efforts. Its struggles, and sufferings, and sacrifices have furnished better homes, better food and better raiment for millions of women and children. No one need feel that he is humbling his pride when he walks with the men who form the backbone of the only organization that monopoly fears; the only movement not supported by "tainted" money; the only body of men with strength and courage enough to defy the power and blandishments of the trust.

Its record should inspire devotion, not apology.

Rather more than a generation ago nearly half the laborers of the United States were slaves, and the rest were scarcely half-free.

The average day's labor was from twelve to fourteen hours; wages were pitifully low; sanitary conditions were such as would now be considered criminal, and relations between employer and employed frequently resembled the relations between master and slave.

When this century began, a recent publication asserts, wages in New York were 40 cents a day, and in other places less. As late as 1835 weavers worked twelve hours for 65 cents; factory women received as low as $1.25 per week for more than thirteen hours per day.

In 1850 the average factory wages were $247 per year; in 1890, $446. Wages in cotton factories in 1830 were 44 cents per day.

About seventy-five years ago trade unions in America began to gather strength, and since then their persistent, insistent demand for better conditions and more wages has never ceased.

What have they accomplished?

Mark the difference between the wages of today and those of seventy-five years ago, for one answer.

Consider, for another reply, these among the many reforms gained:

The homestead law, which for many years relieved the pressure on the eastern labor market; sanitary conditions and ventilation in shops and factories; fire escapes; protection from dangerous machinery; shorter workday; Saturday half-holiday; abolition of child labor; relief to woman labor; weekly payment of wages; industrial and evening schools; compulsory school laws; free text books; boards of arbitration; bureaus of statistics; Australian ballot; abolition of truck stores and Pinkerton thugs; special railroad rates for wage earners; wages guaranteed by lien.

The blessings resulting from these reforms have not inured to union men alone, but have diffused themselves throughout all the working classes in the community.

Viewing these advances, some members of trade unions in New York, about twenty-five years ago, conceived the idea that to set aside a day for celebration and commemoration would promote the progress of the movement. What more natural than that the method of celebration should be by parade, the highest expression of mutual pride and gratification in results attained?

So some of the objects of the celebration of Labor day and its parade are:

1. To celebrate and commemorate advances made.

2. To forge still stronger the chain of brotherhood that binds us together.

3. To stimulate zeal, loyalty and enthusiasm in our work for the complete emancipation of Labor.

4. To promote unity of purpose, of effort, of method and of heart.

5. To more fully realize our growing power, and to make our opposers realize it.

6. To advertise to the world our object (the constant betterment of labor conditions) and our strength.

Unfortunately not all unions realize the importance of this event. Perhaps not a third of the members of trade unions will parade on Labor day. But the spectacle of so large a display of strength by a movement scarcely tolerated, if not openly despised, by court, professor, politician, press, pulpit and "business," should awaken all to the fact that a new force is born into the world—a force that makes for economic righteousness.

Its adherents and beneficiaries should not allow indolence and indifference to interfere with their loyalty.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

The label committee recently had printed several thousand stickers, and good results are expected. It reads as follows: "Ask for this label on your printing. It's a guarantee of proper conditions, fair wages and eight hours."

It is expected that a few of our ex-members, and several of those eligible for membership, will take advantage of the opportunity offered them for the next three months. Under a suspension of the rules the fee has been reduced to $1. This runs to the third Thursday in October (19).

Great credit is due Frederick Hawley and William Pfieffer, of the Marigold Printing Company, and James Cherry, of the American Graphophone Company, members of the pressmen's union, for their efforts in giving the printers of this city an old-fashioned clambake on Sunday, July 23. Every one enjoyed himself and was well filled with the choice viands provided by these gentlemen. Each one present was given a tag with the following inscription:

To Schleichert's Grove. Look out! the printers are "coming." First annual blowout of the Printers' Club, Sunday, July 23, 1905, at Schleichert's Grove. Don't kick. The cook is a big man and this is his bad day. Always wear this. Return check. If you can't find your way home show this check to the first policeman you meet.

At the meeting of the eight-hour committee delegates in Hartford, in June, Newtown and Fairfield were placed in the Bridgeport district, and at our meeting in July President Coates was appointed to look after these towns and report at the next meeting. Our president is an earnest worker, and is always on the alert to advance the interests of the union and our label. It was through his efforts that the printing committee of the board of aldermen were made up of members favorable to the use of the label. Danbury has appointed a committee to act with Bridgeport.

A committee has been appointed to wait on Manager Smith, of Smith's Theater, in relation to having the program for the season of 1905–06 appear with the label. It is said that the committee were successful.

At a recent meeting of the central labor union the election of officers was held, and William J. Brennan, of No. 252, was elected treasurer.

LAS VEGAS, N. M.

A word or two concerning this booming town of the southwest and of conditions unionwise may be of interest to readers of THE JOURNAL. As most "prints" already know, this town has been chosen as the site of the National Fraternal Sanitarium, and the section is noted for its health-giving properties to those suffering from lung trouble. Early in September the institution will begin to receive patients, but already people of all classes are pouring into the city, and accommodations are almost at a premium.

At the annual meeting for election of officers last month, A. Ray Bowman was elected president, vice E. J. Scott, and the writer elected secretary-treasurer, vice Simon Mares.

Harry Oakes, formerly of Las Vegas, and latterly down Douglas (Ariz.) way, came back to his old love a few weeks ago.

Ed Hayes looked in and out a while back.

Ray Bowman, who came to us from Denver, and assumed charge of the Optic linos, has vacated No. 1 for the more important job of having entire charge of the "rag."

Charley Peterson, who formerly had charge of the makeup, now owns the title of "advertising manager."

No. 312 is today in good shape, and its officers are carrying out the letter of the law as we have been taught to understand it in the larger cities, and the result is generally satisfactory to both employer and employe.

"Vamos to Vegas" is the button-cry of the territory for the Vegas fair next month.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.

Frank K. Foster will be in New Haven the latter part of September. No. 47 is very fortunate to be assured of a visit from him. We will try and make this event a "clincher" as regards the eight-hour day.

It is a pleasure to read the letters appearing in THE JOURNAL by my friends Garman and Birdsall as to the conditions in that good city of Denver. Surely there can be no argument against the shorter workday when our opponents are educated by the experience of some of the best and most successful employing printers, ones who have been conducting eight-hour modern plants for years. And the proof of this assertion is my being employed therein.

I wish to congratulate my western friends who were fortunate enough to meet No. 47's ex-president, John McGowan, who recently returned from his trip to San Francisco. He paid a visit to Denver and the Home, all the places of interest in Colorado, and reports a delightful trip and reception. We are pleased to have him with us again.

The best plan I know of to remedy the "open shop" is to interest yourself in the apprentice of today. They are the future.

We have a few Big Sixes and a lot of little Nines, eh? Well, I think the little Nines will all look like Sixes on January 1, 1906.

BATAVIA, N. Y.

When Batavia Typographical Union was organized three years ago no one was more elated over the accomplishment than Alvin J. Fox, who, through a great many years, had been a loyal defender of the organized craft, and today Mr. Fox is as young in spirit as any of the boys. When the civil war began he immediately volunteered his services to preserve the Union, and was a brave soldier, and Upton Post, G. A. R., is proud of his record. For a period of twelve years he was employed at his trade in Richmond, Va., cashing up on the Dispatch, Post, Star, News and Times, being foreman at one time of the latter paper. "There was a merry lot of fellows on the Times," remarked Mr. Fox, referring to the period of his employment in Richmond, "and there was always something doing. Never heard of the Richmond earthquake, I presume? Well, a chap named Ezekiel did, and I'll bet he remembers that tremendous 'subterranean' disturbance with a vividness he will always retain. It happened like this: There had been a real lively quaking of the earth a short time previous to this memorable incident, and everybody was on the tiptoe of expectancy of a recurrence of the shock—Ezekiel in particular. The composing room was directly over the sanctum, and when copy was all in Ezekiel had a habit of remaining after the other writers had left and taking a quiet nap until the forms went to press. Suddenly there was a deep, heavy sound, the building seemed to rock on its foundations, and every mother's son rushed down stairs and into the street, the thoroughly terrified Ezekiel, rudely awakened by the great terrestrial upheaval, following in double quick order. Ezekiel's professional instinct was keen, mind you, even though in the very grip of impending death, and here was a grand scoop for a man right on the spot! The wires were soon hot with a glowing description of the visitation sent to New York papers. And then came the climax. The boys saw that things had gone far enough, took Ezekiel to a secluded corner of a café and unfolded to him the plot—how every man in the composing room, armed with some heavy object, had, at a given word, dropped it from an elevation and made a mad rush for egress—but Ezekiel fired up at this, thought he was being guyed, and, do you know, it was really over a week before he took any stock in the fact that he was duped."

Batavia Typographical Union takes the stand that it is not good policy, and in fact not at all necessary, to impose a fine upon members who should not parade Labor day. Every union man who possibly can march will do so without any urging in the matter.

Assemblyman Samuel Prince, of New York, who represents the thirty-second district, is to be the Labor day orator in Batavia. Mr. Prince, who is twenty-six years old, and a graduate of the New York University Law School, with the degree of LL. B., is an earnest worker in the union cause, and is a member of the cigarmakers' organization. While in the assembly Mr. Prince has been the able champion of every bill designed to benefit workingmen.

Town Clerk Edward F. Short, who, before entering the political arena, conducted a job printing office in Batavia, and who holds an honorary withdrawal card from No. 511, is being boomed for sheriff.

William R. Lucas, who represented No. 511 at the Toronto convention, has accepted a position as linotypist on the New York City Record, where his brother is employed. Mr. Lucas is a royal good fellow, and all the boys wish him abundant success.

The label exhibit at the Genesee county fair in September promises to be a novel one. The management has agreed to furnish a tent, and the printers are to operate a press on the grounds, turning out literature and cards containing references to the use of union labels; the granite workers will have a carver at work; the cigarmakers a member turning out the blue label product; the painters an artist doing designs; the architectural wood carvers will be represented, etc. Why would not this idea be worthy of emulation in other localities?

The eight-hour movement is spreading to other trade organizations than the typographical. The carvers in the architectural department of the Batavia wood works have been on strike since the middle of June for the shorter workday, and up to August 15 not one "free and independent" American citizen had come forward to take a striker's job.

It seems as though the labor press gives up altogether too much valuable space in replying to the vilifications launched by union haters. Advertising such malevolents is time wasted, for they are not worthy to receive even the morsel of dignity which the reply establishes. Let the rabble go on with its ranting. The labor press can find plenty of wholesome educational matter to lay before its readers without getting down in the mire.

There ought to be more International Typographical Union buttons worn by the membership of No. 511. The carpenters are quite up-to-date in wearing emblems of their union.

CLEVELAND, OHIO.

The eight-hour day conference committee met at Canton in July and held its first district convention. The meeting was a success. The next meeting will be held at Alliance, which city needs organizing.

Hats off to John Chinn and the rest of the Toronto boys. The convention was by far the best ever.

The Ohio delegation met while in Toronto and organized for the State Eight-hour Conference, which will be held at Columbus, Saturday and Sunday, September 30 and October 1. Max Hayes, of Cleveland, was elected chairman of the meeting. The meeting was largely attended and the state was well represented. The Columbus delegates will make arrangements for the convention. The meeting closed with a short talk on the eight-hour day by the chairman, Max Hayes, of Cleveland.

Hail! Hail! the gang is all gone.

There is no doubt in my mind but that the boys will return home full of eight-hour ginger and ready to start in and keep up the fight until the victory is clean and complete. JOSEPH WEINER.

About thirty-five years ago Henry Rising was born in Iowa. A few years later he learned typesetting on a country paper. Fourteen years ago Henry strolled into Spokane and began life there as a reporter on the old Spokesman, now Spokesman-Review. He is now the editor of the Spokane Chronicle. Many amusing stories are told of Henry, but the best is one told by himself, as follows: "The Methodists were in the midst of a great revival at the Howard street church, and with several printers strolled in to see how swift the thing really was. The minister announced a hymn and we all joined in, standing on our feet. Then the audience was seated, and the minister read slowly and impressively another hymn. When he concluded, he looked over the congregation, and his eye resting directly on me, he said: 'The congregation please sing without rising.'"

Frank H. McCarter was for years foreman of the Spokane Chronicle and just about the best that ever happened in treatment of his men. Mac got started right up at Erie, Pa., when eighteen years of age, ran away and married a girl near his own age in 1872. Mac took Greeley's advice and came west a year or so later and found work in Wichita, Kan. Here Mac met his Waterloo in the practical joke line. The McCarters were expecting daily the arrival of an heir. One night while Mac was at work the little fellow came. Across the street was a neighbor who, on the previous morning, had become parent of twins. The doctor in attendance at McCarter's officiated at both events. Mrs. McCarter was always a genial lady and fond of a joke. She proposed that the doctor go over to the neighbors and get the twins, and then send for Mac. The twins were soon in the McCarter household, and a messenger despatched for Mac. He came in all out of breath. "What is it, Sadie?" he asked. "What is it? It's three. Look at them." Mac stood for a moment in speechless silence, and then, "My God!—and only $20 a week." The son who figured in this joke is now on the East Oregonian at Pendleton, Ore.

Smoky Johnson and Machinist McCoy were put up against a serious problem on the Mergenthaler last week. The manager had been notified that a new star wheel was needed on No. 3. This order was hung on the machine. "Machinist, please put on a new sky wheel." Mac and Smoky searched all the books they had in an endeavor to find out just what really had happened to No. 3.

CHARLES R. LEARY.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

As insurance, out-of-work funds, pensions, etc., are being discussed I wish to call the attention of the craft to the remarkable showing of the North American Sick Beneficial Society. The society was organized April 17, 1903, with seventy-six members. The dues are 15 cents per week and the benefits $10.20 per week. The August, 1905, report of Secretary A. C. Roray shows the society has paid out in benefits and has remaining in the treasury the following: Paid in benefits 1903, $209.10; 1904, 421.60; to August, 1905, 244.80. Total, $875.50. Cash on hand, $231.29. Since July 1, 1904, the members have paid no dues. This has been made possible, partly, from the profits of a tobacco "snap" conducted by the society. This is one way you can "smoke-up," "blow hot air" and do some good. The constitution of the society in part says: This society has for its object the relief of any member who shall be detained from business on account of sickness, disability or accident. * * * Only persons who are members of the North American chapel shall be eligible. * * * Any one joining the society shall pay a pro rata share of the amount in the treasury as shown by the last monthly report. * * * Any member leaving the employ of the company shall cease to be a member, and shall receive a pro rata share of the amount in the treasury. * * * The dues shall be 15 cents per week. * * * When the sum of $300 has accumulated in the treasury, dues shall cease until the sum becomes less than $200, when the regular dues of 15 cents per week shall be continued. * * * If the sick committee reports favorably, the secretary-treasurer shall give the sick member an order on the treasury at the rate of $1.70 per day, payable weekly (six days to constitute a week). * * * No member shall receive benefits for more than ninety-one days.

"God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb."

W. C. Macpherson and wife, Mrs. John Meade, President A. D. Calvert, Harry Miller and Thomas Williams, were among the Philadelphians at the Toronto convention.

The Labor day parade this year promises to outdo those of former years. No. 2 will take its usual conspicuous part, the eight-hour day question being an incentive for every member to be in line. Numbers are impressive.

Forty years ago (1865) the National Typographical Union, now the International Typographical Union, met in Philadelphia. At this convention it was decided to extend the jurisdiction of the National Union over the Dominion of Canada. The records also say "It was deemed inadvisable to take any action on the eight-hour movement, and all favorable action was met by opposition. It was finally agreed that the subject should be brought to the attention of subordinate unions, which should instruct their delegates to the next convention as to what disposition should be made of it." Forty years ago, and yet to quote President Ellis, in his Toronto speech, "it would be ruinous to undertake to put the printing office on an eight-hour basis in the immediate future."

A recent decision at Cincinnati says that when a "sit holder" puts on a "sub," the latter is entitled to what the regular gets, so in my effort to "punk" out Meade's space this month I expect what he gets—hell. C. J. ZENTMEYER.

WILMINGTON, DEL.

It is a source of much regret among the membership of No. 123 that we were denied the great satisfaction of having our delegate in the convention at Toronto. It is not due, however, to any lack of interest in that event either by the members or chosen delegate. The readers of THE JOURNAL are aware of the illness of our Secretary, Albert O. H. Grier, whom the union had elected delegate. Mr. Grier had been confined to his bed for eight weeks with typhoid fever, and at this writing has recovered only sufficiently to be able to walk three or four squares from his home. While it is a disappointment to No. 123, it is a still greater one to Mr. Grier, who had made all arrangements for being there and able to greet his old friends and make new ones. We feel sure the membership at large will extend their sympathy to us in this event, believing us to be always willing to do anything for the advancement of the craft.

Our eight-hour committee, just at present, are not doing much shouting. They are saving the necessary wind to make a fitting accompaniment to the fireworks of the celebration after the first of the year. We are glad to notice the wave of an eight-hour ocean gradually growing larger and stronger, and instead of going away is surging in our direction. May it sweep on until it covers the entire Atlantic coast from the woods of Canada to the wave-lapped shore at Key West. What are you doing to help it along?

Gilbert Foreaker, of West Chester, Pa., was around shaking hands with old acquaintances this month. "Gilly" is a devoted follower of Izaak Walton and had been spending several days in the near vicinity of the Delaware breakwater.

The local union of musicians is rapidly growing in strength and is making itself felt in the musical circles of our city.

Work seems to be holding on very good, with indications for a good fall and winter trade.

We were glad to hear how Memphis secured the eight hours. Who's next?

Considerable discussion is heard as to whether it will be a peaceable concession or not with us. "War is h—l," we are looking for peace—with honor.

We have some views concerning the country printers. Possibly we may inflict them on a suffering constituency next month. D. H. RUSSELL.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

Last month this letter started: "The contest is on." If the reader will now substitute "off" for "on," the situation will be accurately described, with the added information that the eight-hour workday is a fixture in printing circles in the metropolis of the Pacific Coast, the "union shop" is more firmly established than ever, the locked-out men were reinstated, and the scales of wages of the organizations affected in the dispute continue as the minimum basis on which to estimate for work. If there is anything we didn't get, we don't know it. There are two offices yet to return to the fold, but it is only a question of time until they realize that there is no money in operating without competent help, and the efforts to divert work to label offices will also prove an important factor in arriving at a settlement. These two shops are sadly handicapped for want of printers, pressmen and feeders who are thoroughly acquainted with their business. The men at present locked out number less than twenty compositors—exclusive of International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union men—out of a membership of over eight hundred, and they are rapidly locating themselves in other offices. It is no extravagant statement to say that the victory for the allied unions is complete.

John Macintyre, secretary of the United Typothetæ of America, arrived in San Francisco shortly before our agreement expired with the nine-hour day in his pocket. The citizens and the press stated in unmistakable terms that prevailing conditions should not be disturbed. Despite promises that help would be supplied those shops deciding for the nine-hour system, and that the resources of the United Typothetæ of America and the citizens' alliance would be placed at their disposal, it was soon found that men could not be procured to set type or run presses outside of the organized workers, and that public sympathy was so strongly in favor of eight hours that it was useless to continue the contest. After a complete tie-up for three weeks, the largest shop on the coast—that of the H. S. Crocker Company—resumed relations with the unions and reopened. This action defeated all the typothetæ efforts. A few days afterward several conferences were held between the interested parties, and the result was the complete collapse of the attack on our eight hours, as outlined in the preceding paragraph. Mr. Macintyre returned east with the nine-hour day in another pocket. We don't want it.

A clever attempt of our friends of the opposition to divide the printing trade union forces was frustrated. The typothetæ offered the pressmen and feeders eight hours, leaving the typesetters out in the cold. This was a surprising move, because the main contention of the employers was that the pressmen were bound under the International agreement to return to the nine-hour day. Committees from the labor council and the typographical union addressed the pressmen and feeders assembled in mass meeting to consider the typothetæ proposition, advising strongly against its acceptance. There was little need to do this, as the members of the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union in this city are true-blue unionists, and unanimously decided to stand with No. 21.

Eight-hour history for the International Typographical Union was written in Gothic type in San Francisco during the month of July, 1905.

The committees from the various organizations worked harmoniously together, and the members actively supported their efforts. The writer had the pleasure of the company on No. 21's committee of four men who did splendid work. Though sleep was at a discount for several weeks during the trouble, there was not one discordant word uttered. Organizer F. J. Bonnington was ubiquitous, and the International had a man looking after its interests who was on the alert at all times. George A. Tracy brought his magnetic Washington eye into play on the typothetæ committee in the conferences, and his ripe experience in union affairs rendered him invaluable. H. L. White, our secretary-treasurer and delegate to Toronto, though very busy attending to his office duties, did yeoman service. John H. Marble was our legal adviser, as well as one of the committee men.

At one of our special meetings we had as guests President Martin P. Higgins and Third Vice-President F. P. Ranagan of the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union, accompanied by a delegation of local pressmen. The addresses delivered helped to cement the good feeling prevailing in our ranks, and an extension of the spirit of true unionism was predicted throughout the jurisdiction.

The San Francisco Labor Clarion assisted materially in helping to win the late dispute. Its columns were always open to our side, of course, and several well-written leading articles were replete with eight-hour facts and figures—furnishing information that will not be used by the United Typothetæ of America.

The lessons of the lockout are many. A good treasury looms up as a safeguard first to be considered. The next thing is more money, and the third point is still more money. We have to thank those earnest workers who built up our strong financial system during the peaceful years. Another factor is thorough organization—keep at it, bring them in. The spirit of unionism and confidence is growing. It helped us in this city by the Pacific.

We will celebrate by turning out in force on Labor day. It will be an eight-hour parade, so far as the allied printing trades council division is concerned. The sentiment for the shorter workday for other unions has received a marked impetus by our success.

The Toronto convention is in session while this letter is under construction. May its deliberations increase the power of the International Typographical Union, add strength to the trade union movement, and result in the establishment without friction of a universal eight-hour workday.

WILL J. FRENCH.

BOZEMAN, MONT.

The members of No. 551 were shocked, on the morning of August 8, to learn of the death of their president, Martin Lundwall, jr., which occurred on the evening of the 7th. All had known that he had not been feeling well for some time, but none seemed to realize his end was so near.

He had been down town on the day of his death, chatting with his various printer friends; and while in the office of the Republican-Courier, where he was employed, had stated to his employers that he thought he would be able to resume his old place at the keyboard in a few days.

It is hardly probable that the death of any other member of the union would have caused more genuine regret, judging from the recital of the many good qualities of which "Mart" was possessed, and the "boys" felt they could not do too much to show the respect and esteem in which he was held, as evidenced by the beautiful floral pillow, with the inscription "I. T. U.," and the turning out of every member, except one, who was out of town, to attend the funeral.

In this connection it is but fair to state that No. 551 is justly proud of its "honorary" member, "Bob" Burns, who, although engaged in other lines of business, deems it a privilege and a duty to add his presence and contribute with his means to anything and everything pertaining to the printers' welfare. He was with the printers in the funeral procession, and none had higher words of commendation for the deceased than he. I believe it is but voicing the sentiments of our entire membership when I say, "May the shadow of 'Bob' Burns never grow less." Would there were more "exprints" like him.

The members of the Courier firm (the Republican-Courier having lately consolidated) also contributed a beautiful floral wreath with the cabalistic "30" in the background, in recognition of Martin's long, faithful service with them, he having served his apprenticeship with them about eighteen years ago, and having been with them the greater part of that time. The following extract, from the pen of his long-time employer, seems but a fitting tribute to the man:

Poor Martin! such was his attachment to his employers and his ardent devotion to duty, that he could not realize that the last "copy" was in, that the cabalistic figures of "30" were scrawled on the last page he had taken from the hook, and that the last "proof" that was taken was so clean that it required no corrections. He died as he had lived—without a murmur from his lips or a word of complaint from his tongue. He gently fell asleep—to that sleep that knows no earthly waking.

Last, but not least, was the action of Livingston local No. 489, who, upon learning of Martin's death, sent their popular president, J. E. Mallory, to represent them in paying their last respects to his memory.

In a lifetime acquaintance the writer can briefly attest the many good traits of character of the deceased, the one shining out more brilliantly than all the rest, as expressed by another oldtime friend, "He was ever faithful to his friends and duties—none had aught to say against him or he of them."

Dick Morrell, of the Republican-Courier, has been enjoying several days' outing at Chico springs.

S. H. Brackett drifted into town about ten days ago with a big crop of whiskers and a sunburnt face, to pay us his periodical visit. He says we "can't lose him." J. W. ELLICKSON.

DES MOINES, IOWA.

As I sat, one evening, lonely,
In my office, thinking only
Of the joys of the convention which I'd tasted once before,
Suddenly before me spying
Printers on-To-ron-to* flying,
Straightway, then, I fell to sighing—
First I sighed and then I swore,
'Cause the vision made me "sore."

As the train that bore them rumbled,
And my thoughts became less jumbled,
Then it was I quickly "tumbled" to the fact—why not before?—
That while they were onward steaming,
I, with all my plans and scheming,
Frantic work and copious steaming,
Couldn't get beyond the door;
Hard luck, certainly—and more.

Then I saw the meeting city,—
Old Toronto, big and pretty,—
And I thought it is a pity I can't go to Edward's shore,
There to spend a day and night, or E'en a week, with "print" and writer—
Lynch and Bramwood, Cooke and Kreiter,
And the many hundreds more,—
Then it was my hair I tore.

Carl S. Evans, of Cedar Rapids Union, has been appointed by President Lynch to prosecute the work of organization in Iowa. Mr. Evans was endorsed by the Iowa Printing Trades League.

Sod widows frequently make good time in getting from the grave to the gay.

If, as they have repeatedly declared, the employing job printers of St. Louis, Philadelphia and some other cities are determined to inaugurate the "open shop," why don't some of them put their plan to the test? Do they lack the nerve, or are they bluffing?

"Sam" Laidley has returned from St. Joe after a sojourn of four years in that city and is working at the Welch plant.

Or, as Cooke might have said, in conformity to the Boston vernacular, some specimens of the self-divorced consort are closely related to the nectarine.

The circular recently issued by the business men of Battle Creek, aiming to counteract the depressing effects of Postnuts' representations of conditions in that city, indicates clearly that the bran magnate will get his pretty soon now.

President Bates, of No. 15, has favored me with a copy of the souvenir program issued by the ex-delegates' association of Rochester. Visitors to the Flower City are promised a royal time, and, as I know from experience, there's a town where good things are within easy reach. Among the features of the publication is a roster of No. 15's membership, in which I find the names of many friends of years agone.

"Bert" Warfel has resigned the presidency of No. 118, given up a good position at Miller's, left a host of friends here, and has located in Denver. W. G. Waters, who declined to stand for re-election to the chair at the contest in May, has been prevailed upon to change his views regarding the tenure of office, and was unanimously chosen to succeed Warfel. Waters is a wise, conservative leader, a good parliamentarian, and makes a satisfactory president.

The first annual picnic of No. 118 was held at Union park, August 2, and was an enjoyable outing for the members and their families. The employing printers and members of the allied trades were the guests of the union. A downpour of rain in the forenoon served to cut down the anticipated attendance, yet a goodly number was present in the evening to enjoy the program and the dancing that followed. In the afternoon an athletic program and a ball game were pulled off in the mud, and prizes awarded in each event. A general basket dinner occupied the time from the conclusion of the athletic features until seven o'clock, when the crowd gathered at the pavilion. Here a program of many good things was presented. President Waters supplemented his address of welcome with a talk on "The Typographical Union, Its Purposes and Benefits," which was full of good thought. The printers' quartet, composed of Messrs. Lockwood, Beckett, Hutton and Stebbins, sang several times to the pleasure of all who heard them. Mrs. Bessie Boylan told in a terse, convincing way what a union member should be. This was Mrs. Boylan's first appearance as a public speaker, and though her ability as a rapid-fire talker is well known hereabouts, her success as a debutante on the platform was a pleasing surprise to her friends. J. B. Nesbit also spoke on "The Printers' Home." William McClain, who recently came from St. Louis to take charge of the Register and Leader machines, sang two numbers and made a hit. Mr. McClain possesses a pleasing baritone voice, and his friends in St. Louis and Chicago will be glad to know that he is sustaining his reputation as a vocalist. The members of No. 118 are well pleased with this first picnic project, and the outing will be made an annual event.

Will Brother Henderson, of Rochester, tell us what caused the Union and Advertiser to come into the fold? That paper has been the chief enemy of organized labor in the Flower City for many years.

At this writing it is not known what action will be taken by the Toronto convention bearing on the eight-hour movement, but judging from the unanimity with which it was supported at St. Louis last year, and the almost unanimous endorsement given it by the referendum, it is safe to predict that no backward step will be taken, neither will a postponement of the glad day be attempted. Regardless of what may be the action of the typothetæ on this momentous question at their convention, there is nothing for the International Typographical Union to do but "stand pat," and the prediction is then made that the Toronto convention will do that in a way that will permit of no misconception of the purpose of the eight-hour crusade.

J. B. Nesbit.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.

As the September Journal will be crowded for space, on account of the convention proceedings, this letter will be made as brief as possible.

Within the next thirty days another daily paper will be established in Los Angeles—the Evening News; Samuel T. Clover, editor and publisher. For several years Mr. Clover was editor-in-chief of the Evening Express, during which time he earned the reputation of being a thorough newspaper man. With Clover at the head of any paper, there can be no doubt of its success.

The Examiner has ordered another press and two additional linotype machines. The report is current that Mr. Hearst has purchased, at a cost of $450,000, the flatiron block at the intersection of Spring and Main streets, facing Ninth, upon which, it is said, he is to erect a permanent home for the Examiner. This location now is known as "up-town," and is ten blocks distant from the Times building—about the same distance that the Examiner leads the Times in every respect.

The action of the Toronto convention in connection with the eight-hour workday is eagerly awaited in Los Angeles. Nowhere in the jurisdiction is there a stronger desire to inaugurate the shorter workday.

The allied printing trades of this city held a banquet on Thursday evening, August 10, at which President Stanley B. Wilson of the typographical union acted as toastmaster. Each of the seven affiliated crafts was represented, and the affair developed into an eight-hour love feast. The banquet was a complete success—so much so, that another probably will be given before next January.

The Eight-Hour Conference of Southern California will hold its second meeting on Sunday, August 20, this time at Riverside.

Francis Drake.

CINCINNATI, OHIO.

Well, the fifty-first session has passed into history, and, so far as the writer has been able to ascertain, was one of "strenuosity," but it is to be hoped that resultant therefrom unanimity of action in the eight-hour propaganda will be made stronger.

Speaking of the eight-hour question, there has always been a doubt in the writer's mind as to the exact justice in our system relative to hours and wages. For instance: When an applicant for membership is passed favorably upon and obligated, we guarantee to him or her, as the case may be, all the rights and privileges of the organization, the obligation being very strict. Then upon investigation the new member finds that a portion of the union works eight hours and receives a compensation that is in excess of another portion whose hours are longer and whose wages are less. Some will say, of course, that the conditions of the trade caused this. True, but we make the conditions, in the abstract, be they good or bad. Again, all pay the same dues—international. Some years ago this condition obtained in Cincinnati in the newspaper offices. Machine operators (afternoon) received $23 per week of forty-eight hours and all other employes $19 per week of fifty-four hours, and it was conceded on all sides that the $19 men were superior workmen to the $23 men. But after some little effort all employes on newspapers now have the same hours and wages. There is no denying the fact that it takes as much intelligence, if not more, to become a proficient job man as it does an operator. Of course, there are freaks who are operators—a cog in the machine—who try to set the world afire for a few years, and then—

Not a few months ago one of this kind was telling a story of how he got fired to a party of friends because he set too much type. The question was asked how that occurred: "Well, I set a great bunch of type, but such a small amount of it got to the stone," said he.

Now, the slogan should be equal opportunities, equal hours, equal wages. What say you all? There are few, if any organized workmen where there are two scales of wages—time scales, I mean—in vogue. Over fifty years of effort by the International Typographical Union should show different results. The time is now at hand for the hour regulation, then let us take up the wage question.

Ex-Secretary W. P. Reily has purchased a farm and has retired to a quiet life.

Andrew (Kid) Conly, who has traveled a few, says that Toronto was not "dry" for several days. Andy was married just one year ago, and claims the Toronto trip was his honeymoon.

The Enquirer Job Printing Company locked out its printers, members of No. 3, because the allied printing trades council ordered the withdrawal of the label for non-compliance with press assistants' rules and regulations, but the latter organization's members are still at work.

There was a rumor here that Pittsburg would be the next convention city, and some disappointment was felt that such was not the case. The last time the Home town entertained the convention was in 1896. The writer was a delegate at that session, and well does he remember it. It was there where Secretary-Treasurer Bramwood was inducted into office. Another member has been prominently before the membership since, who was at the Springs —Frank Morrison. Likewise the delegate from Philadelphia at Toronto.

Our newspaper scale stands for another year as at present, with a little stronger interpretation of the priority law.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH.

On July 1 the Ellis Publishing Company of this city adopted the nine-hour day. This makes three nine-hour offices in our city. Mr. Colbert came from Chicago and helped adjust the matter. No. 429 extended him a rising vote of thanks for his services, which were greatly appreciated.

Several of the local newspapers have referred to an article published in the July Era, which states C. W. Post was going to convert the Phelps Sanatorium, an immense institution of this city, which so far has proved a complete financial failure, into a home for needy printers. Post makes a stipulation that there shall be no discrimination made in admitting union or non-union printers. It is safe to say that this is merely a scheme to get free advertising, and not a bona fide offer. If, however, this generous proposition is made in good faith, it might be well to call Mr. Post's attention to the fact that numerous small stockholders practically lost their entire holdings when the sanatorium was sold to him by the receiver, and that, while the institution may legally belong to him, there is a higher moral law which would compel the typographical union to decline the offer, and see that any influence it might possess in the matter was used to induce Post to sell the sanatorium and divide the proceeds among the unfortunate stockholders who have lost their savings in this enterprise.

Representatives from employing printers of both Chicago and Detroit have been in Battle Creek to try and secure help for these cities. The agent from Chicago wanted to make two-year contracts, and expressly stated he was working for the open shop. They have both left the city after a couple days' canvass, having been unable to secure a single printer.

A few of the manufacturers of the United States seem to think that the present wage system has become a permanent fixture, and that labor will always be bought and sold in the labor market. They seem to think the workingman should work the greatest number of hours for the smallest wage to which he can be made to consent. They think the sole motive in modern industry is individual self-interest. Any measure advocated by trade unions which would tend to benefit the conditions of the laborer are opposed by them as impossible. If this aggregation should by some unforeseen circumstance get too powerful it might become necessary to turn the tables and prove by actual demonstration that progress in the conditions governing the American workman can not be suspended to gratify the exorbitant greed of a few selfish manufacturers. Charles de Bruyn.

COFFEYVILLE, KAN.

No. 578 continues to grow. There was one initiation at the August meeting.

The Daily Journal has a new machine.

There is some talk of the printers playing the plumbers a game of baseball in the near future.

Only a few tourist printers have visited Coffeyville so far this month.

At the August meeting it was decided to hold a genuine picnic. A good committee was appointed and a special meeting was held a week later to discuss plans and make arrangements. The event comes off Sunday, August 20. We hope to give a full report of the gigantic affair next month.

Work is holding up good at all the offices for this time of the year.

September 8, 9 and 10 will be big days in this town, and the printers won't fail to enjoy themselves at the much-advertised Inter-State and Territorial Exposition. Mylo G. Karr.

PONTIAC, MICH.

A short time ago a tourist (about fifty years old) came to town. He walked from town to town and sometimes stopped at a farm house over night. He carried a phonograph with him, which was quite a load, and also about fifty records. He asserted that he occasionally got a day's work here and there, sometimes in a print shop and sometimes on the farm. After a day's work on the farm, he said, that he usually gave a concert. The phonograph proved a favorite with the rural residents, and obtained many a supper and breakfast and night's lodging for him. He carried a good card which was paid right up to August. "When in some of the small towns and villages, the proprietors of printing offices dislike to have me talk to their employes about eight hours or the union," he said. "I am doing all that I can for eight hours, and I want to see the boys get it, although I think that it is sure to come."

A new linotype was installed in the Daily Gazette, last month. Harry H. Parr, of No. 18, obtained the "sit" and seems to be holding his own.

The Daily Press and Daily Gazette baseball teams recently crossed bats with the result of 13 to 7. A printers' team has now been organized and is ready for anything that comes this way.

Since the lockout of the jobmen of No. 18 (Detroit) a "rat" hunter from Detroit struck town. He entered the Press office and the foreman, F. Wright Smith, told him where to get off. He claimed to be an insurance man, but Smith did not see it that way and walked him out. He was one of Whirl's tools, but Smith gave him a "whirl."

Dan Grogan, pressman of the Press, recently had a severe attack of appendicitis, but is now able to work.

A short time ago a representative of the Duplex Press visited the Press office. He evidently was a "Gravenuts" man from the following: "This is an orderly office. The boys all seem to be working, and they mind their business, too, from appearances. Over at our town (Battle Creek) the offices are in an uproar all the time, there being so many agitators. You know we have a union over there." He expected a reply that this was not a union shop, but was told, "that this is a union shop." He looked astonished, turned and walked out, without saying anything.

Mr. Union Jobman please remember that if you want to help the cause of unionism, you should put that label wherever you put the imprint, on all your jobs. If the coat fits put it on, as it applies here very nicely.

Frank W. Seldon, delegate to Toronto from 512, must have been right at home while there. He worked on the Globe and Mail for quite a time years ago and also secured his better half from Toronto.

John P. Hallinan, formerly an operator on the Press, but now of Marshall, has been helping out on the "Lino" with some extra work and also working while the boys have taken their vacations.

No. 512 received an invitation from No. 18 (Detroit) to unite with them in the Labor day parade. The invitation was accepted. ROY V. HENDERSON.

PADUCAH, KY.

On July 24 the local installed the following officers for the ensuing term: E. M. Willis, president; William Deal, vice-president; J. E. Baker, secretary-treasurer; C. F. Johnson, assistant secretary; H. C. Green, guardian; G. W. Walters, William Deal and C. F. Johnson, delegates to central labor union.

The membership has been very prompt in attending the regular meetings of No. 134 for many months, and are taking much interest in the eight-hour fight that other cities are preparing for.

The same agreement existing between the various offices and the union has been placed in the hands of the executive committee for the signatures of the proprietors, and it is not thought any objection will be made by the employers.

No. 134 is looking after all men on the eligible list in this territory and getting them in line for the struggle our sister unions in the big cities are likely to have on January 1. At present there is only one typo in the city not a member of the local, and he is employed in a private printing office of the Southerland Medicine Company.

The Southern Printing Company, with which the local union had some trouble a few years ago, has incorporated with a $10,000 capital stock, and the president of the new concern, which is now known as the Paducah Printing and Bookbinding Company, has applied for a copy of the agreement to sign up. Harlan Griffith, the former proprietor, has become a member of No. 134 and is connected with the new concern.

Mike Danaher accepted a position as foreman with the Paducah Printing and Bookbinding Company, and took charge on Monday, July 23.

F. M. Kennedy has resigned his position as foreman with the Billings Printing Company and accepted a place at Jacksonville, Fla. He will leave for his new position about September 1.

No. 134 has decided to have a float in the Labor day parade this year. CLAUD JOHNSON.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.

Work is somewhat dull at present, with enough men in town to supply the demand.

Our Labor day celebration this year promises to eclipse anything we have ever had. President Samuel Gompers, of the American Federation of Labor, and other noted men will deliver addresses.

Michael Fahey accepted a fat situation on the Lake Charles (La.) Press, and arrived there the day before the state was quarantined on account of the yellow fever. He writes interestingly of the situation there.

Guy Spenny was called home to Canton, Ill., recently by the illness of his mother, but reports her as about recovered.

Jack Campbell paid us a visit recently. Jack is playing league baseball this summer, but expects to pound the keyboard again when the baseball season is over.

The decisive victory won by No. 21 at San Francisco looks good to us. Let the good work go on.

NORFOLK, VA.

This union was represented at the second meeting of the southeastern eight-hour convention, held at Atlanta, Ga., on August 28, by E. W. Gaines, who was, at the Charlotte (N. C.) meeting, elected president of that body. This organization plans to do effective work in the southeastern states, and is meeting with great encouragement, as all unions affiliated with it are responding to its call for delegates, at every meeting, and the typothetæ is beginning to wake up to the fact that it has a pretty tough proposition to go up against.

Business in this city is remarkably good for this season of the year, and so far as the writer knows no one who is looking for employment fails to get it.

Another "Merg." is on the way to this city, this time bound for the Dispatch office. It's now up to the Ledger to go them one better.

A committee was appointed at the last regular meeting of this union to arrange for an excursion to one of the nearby ocean resorts. Proceeds thereof to be used in connection with the fund for the eight-hour movement.

William S. Brady, our delegate to Toronto, has returned, and reports a very interesting session of the International Typographical Union. His card was quite a unique one, being a cut of the front of the linotype, the keys colored, and on the copy-holder his card informs the holder thereof that he represents No. 32.

The element known as organized labor has gotten together in this city and organized a "Workingmen's Association." At a largely attended meeting, held on Wednesday night, the 9th, E. W. Gaines, a member of our local, also president of the southeastern eight-hour convention, was nominated as candidate for house of delegates. If he wins out, and it should be the duty of all members of organized labor to support him, it will be the second time in recent years that a member of Norfolk Typographical Union No. 32 has represented this city in the state legislature.

This union, at an adjourned meeting, held on August 13, voted to parade on Labor day. The "official" celebration this year will be held at Ocean View, a resort on the bay. ELWOOD F. MOORE.

ATLANTA, GA.

After passing the house by a splendid majority, the child labor bill met defeat at the hands of the senate by the close vote of 23 to 17. The debate upon the merits of the bill was very heated and lasted five and a half hours. The gallery was crowded with ladies, who cheered to the echo the advocates of the bill. An amusing incident happened when Senator Bennett explained his vote against the bill, stating that had he been certain the women of the state favored the bill he believed he would vote for it. Immediately Senator Candler presented him with a petition signed by about 5,000 Georgia women. He did not change his vote. Despite the fact that a majority of the people of Georgia were in favor of the bill, and that press and pulpit, aided by the labor unions, have worked incessantly for five years to secure its passage, a handful of self-opinionated representatives (?) of the people have seen fit to declare by their votes that they are wiser than those who gave them power. How long is this to last? The remedy is simple and in the hands of the people—the Ballot. Gentlemen of the Georgia senate: "Shame on you!"

The Byrd Printing Company, one of the largest concerns in the city, now has the allied label.

The Lallatte Printing Company will enlarge its plant at an early date, and will employ about ten printers. It will be run as a strictly union office.

The delegates and visitors have returned from the Toronto convention loud in their praises at the entertainment accorded them in lavish manner by the Torontoans. "Dan" Green and "Dick" Holderby were the delegates, while Mrs. Ed Jones represented the auxiliary. Clint C. Houston and "Pete" McAllister went as visitors.

Organizer Wardlaw has just finished an extended tour of Georgia and has been feeling the pulse of the country printer. Out of twelve small cities visited, only two were found to contain a sufficient number of printers to organize unions—Fitzgerald and Brunswick—and these towns have been granted charters. In the larger towns organization work is being carried forward and the prospects are bright for a solid front, should the eight-hour battle be forced on us. Many applications have been received from unorganized towns as a result of the organizer's visit, and the printers in those places were unanimous in assuring him that the union need have no fear of their coming to the larger towns in case of trouble. In no instance was a printer found working in these places who was not in hearty sympathy with the union and the eight-hour movement.

Great preparations are being made for Labor day in this city. The event will eclipse by far any previous effort in the history of Atlanta. The parade will be an important feature. Typographical Union No. 48 will place a handsome and unique float in the parade, carrying out the eight-hour idea. William S. Wier, ex-president of No. 48, has been chosen orator of the day. Mr. Wier has a well-known reputation as an orator, and no better selection could have been made.

At this writing we have every reason to believe the southeastern eight-hour convention, to be held in Atlanta, August 28, will be a complete success from every viewpoint, and will result in much good in the way of securing the much-desired shorter workday. Delegates will be in attendance from every state in the jurisdiction. A banquet will be tendered the visitors in the evening at one of the leading hotels, and other entertaining features have been arranged by the committee.

Now that the Toronto convention has spoken and forever set at rest the tongues of those who said we were only "four-flushing," it behooves all to put shoulder to wheel and join in the organization work now going forward in every section of the country. If every man does his sworn duty, there can be but one result when the issue comes—Success!

And remember January 1 is only four months away.

So don't forget the word Lynch made famous—Organize! W. S. WARDLAW.

BOISE, IDAHO.

Everybody has the fishing fever, and some of the stories told after the return of a day's outing would put our only ex-president to rout.

Ed Parker, machinist-operator at the News, is in the hospital with typhoid fever.

Lewis O'Brien, of Pittsburg, Pa., but formerly of Dublin, is holding down a mill on the Statesman.

Arch Cunningham & Co. will install a Merg. this fall.

F. C. Hurtt, of the Twin Falls News, will install a double-decker in the near future.

Colin McRae "blew in" from his Minidoka claim looking as brown as a hazelnut. He expects to print a few this winter and return to his ranch in the spring. W. E. ROSS.

SIOUX CITY, IOWA.

Carl S. Evans, of Cedar Rapids, the newly-appointed organizer for the International Typographical Union in Iowa, was in Sioux City over night recently, and left next morning for Lemars, a city of 6,000 inhabitants thirty miles northeast of Sioux City. Having had good success in Independence and Anamosa, Mr. Evans was hopeful of placing a charter in Lemars. With this month's work to Mr. Evans' credit, there are now twenty-two unions in Iowa, approximately 1,000 contributing members to the International Typographical Union, and it was to augment this number that the Iowa State Printing Trades League set in motion a movement to secure an organizer for this state for the next few months. Accordingly Carl S. Evans was elected to that position, and he was so appointed by President James M. Lynch. He has already been sufficiently successful to demonstrate the wisdom of his appointment. Carl is genial and loses no time in getting acquainted with unorganized printermen.

Many inquiries are made each month as to the whereabouts of oldtime, well-known printers. For instance some one in a reminiscent mood recently asked: "Wonder where old Col. Ike R. Busby is now?" "Don't know. Last time I heard of Ike he was over in Indiana." Now for the sake of all the anxious ones I will say that if all the oldtimers—Missouri river "pirates" and others—will drop me a postal card I will endeavor to make my letter in the October JOURNAL of interest to the oldtimers. Every one likes to hear from the "rounders." Every printer who has traveled and is well known in several cities may feel that there are some of his acquaintances who would like to know whither he has wandered and what he is doing. The number of letters and postal cards I receive will determine the value of my idea. So do not be bashful about writing, all ye tourists and ex-tourists who can muster the price of a postal card and an inclination to write.

David Barth, who for ten or a dozen years has held the at times onerous and rather unrequited job of assistant foreman on the Journal nightside, has graduated to the machine and has secured a position as one of the operators in the job department of the Journal. Dave learned his trade in the Journal office and used to distribute type for the baseball fans for a consideration and the experience incident thereto, for some of which labor he still remembers very distinctly that the consideration would be still "on the come" were it not barred by the statute of limitations.

Charles Cody, a brother of "Bill," of Minneapolis, Minn., after an experience of fifteen years or less of the wit, wisdom and pathos of Sioux City printing offices, has silently and determinedly, and with the good wishes of all who know him, folded his tent, and will make an honest effort to see some of the great and glorious country of which he is a patriotic citizen. He is now in Omaha. W. H. Mulhall, of Omaha, succeeded Mr. Cody on the Journal.

Edward Burkholder, who was a printer in the government printing office for twelve years, after a stay of two years in Sioux City, has left for New York, where he intends learning the linotype. Mr. Burkholder is a scholarly printer and will be long remembered in Sioux City.

Every once in a while, in the course of inhuman events, it becomes necessary for a union to reiterate and give vitality to some of its time-honored doctrine, and Sioux City is never loath to avail itself of an opportunity so to do. Historians and philosophers in all times have asserted that there can be no progress if the people do not jealously guard their rights, and so it was that No. 180's executive board justly decided that under our law no man shall be put to work and laid off without the privilege of working a full day's time.

If the International Typographical Union can not secure eight hours for its membership, certainly no other craft need have the audacity to lift its voice for the slogan, "Eight hours for work, eight hours for sleep, and eight hours to do what you will." The eight-hour movement is greater than any class or clan of men, or the International Typographical Union, for all that, and it is only the eternal fitness of things that the printer should be first on the firing line in the movement. "Eight hours or bust!" is No. 180's slogan.

A. D. SCOUGAL.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL.

The new eight-hour scale submitted to the bosses does not seem to hit the spot. Several conferences have been held, but nothing accomplished. The bosses submitted several propositions for the committee to consider. An open shop on machines was asked; the standard of competency raised to 36,000 ems; re-sign the old nine-hour scale for three years; eight hours at a proportionate reduction, with an open shop on machines—and then some, all of which were not considered by our committee. Why they want an open shop on the machines, and not elsewhere, was not explained. However, their latest reply is that they refuse to consider the eight-hour question at this time, and want the old scale signed to January 1, 1906, as they claim they do not know that the eight-hour day is coming. Have they heard from Toronto? I guess not.

Isadore ("Izzy") Deutsch, a member of No. 177, well known to the craft at large, died of heart failure Saturday, August 12. Mr. Deutsch was on his way home, and feeling ill, stopped at the police station and asked for assistance of Sergeant Brightman, an old schoolmate, but died before assistance could be had.

The "Endorsing Political Candidates" articles are interesting reading. This town is filled with "stanch unionists." If they want an office, money could not hire them to have a card printed without the label on it. But after election it's different—until they want office again. One candidate refused to accept his "card" with a label on, saying: "I don't want that d—n thing on it." After the election he came to the conclusion that the union people did not "want that d—n thing" on the government payroll. Another endorsement: An active union man was nominated by a labor convention for minority representative. He was later endorsed by all the unions in this district. After the election it was found that his stanchest (?) lieutenants had sold him out. Can you blame Ben Butler for saying, "I am done with the laboring people; they lack cohesion?" That's all.

Did the United Typothetæ of America hear this welkin ring at Toronto: "Eight hours! Eight hours!! Eight hours!!!"

Get into politics, but keep politics out of your union.

Consult "What We Are Doing" columns in THE JOURNAL, and you will see what we are doing. Ten more for the eight-hour day. That helps some.

Fred Wood is now foremanizing at the Pontiac reformatory state printing plant. Not compulsory.

George Hoole, our genial secretary and an X, has gone to Toronto to attend the convention. They can't hold them too far from home for George.

L. A. Gude, X-Toronto, says: "Those Canadians certainly know their business. They made good, all right, all right."

Work in the city is dull at present. Bright prospects for the future, however.

Another "amusing error": A local opera company was to produce the opera, "Chimes of Normandy." Five hundred full-sheet bills read, "Chinese of Norway."

Whether we "wake up, smoke up, cheer up, or get up," or lie down, fall down, or get knocked down, we will get eight hours.

"There's a reason" breakfast foods are receiving a set-back in this town. People are afraid of the after-eating effects.

Organize.

Boom the label. F. C. REED.

HOLYOKE, MASS.

It has come to the notice of the writer that a story is in circulation among the printers of a large city in this state, that Holyoke Typographical Union is not in very good shape. On the contrary, we are in good condition, having put a new scale into effect the past year. All the good shops are strictly union and on good terms with the organization. Eight hours prevails on the newspapers and on machines in job offices; others work nine hours. Everything looks favorable for the eight-hour day. Non-union people are scarce in this city, I am glad to say.

Miss Jennie A. Caffrey, for a number of years a proofreader in the Transcript job room, has resigned and quit the printing business.

R. Lamagdelaine, makeup on the Transcript, is spending his vacation in Canada, visiting relatives and friends. His family accompanies him.

THE JOURNAL is certainly interesting reading, and we feel sure that the awakening of the entire union body over the eight-hour day, and the lengthy discussions thereon, will have a good effect on those whose energies have previously lain dormant. While on some subjects unionists themselves may differ in opinion, the determination to have the eight-hour day is not one of them.

Miss Margaret Dowd, operator on one of the Transcript job machines, is spending a two weeks' vacation with friends at Old Orchard, Maine.

At our July meeting a communication was read from Boston No. 13, calling for a conference of delegates from the different unions of New England to be held in Boston in the near future. No. 253 voted to send a delegate, and elected E. S. Alden as their representative. The eight-hour day will be the chief topic of discussion and considerable good is sure to result from a gathering of this kind.

Fred Keiner flew in, and, after getting a little picking, flew away again.

The central labor union voted not to have a parade this year. There being no park available it was impossible to hold a field day, and the idea of having a parade without the field day did not meet with favor.

Our secretary, August Lehmann, paid a visit to Boston recently.

Wouldn't it make you tired to hear some of the printers in the large cities giving vent to pessimistic feelings as regards a few of the smaller unions and the conditions that they think exist there? It certainly is a poser to guess where they get their information. If these same men would get on the optimistic wagon and give others in their own immediate vicinity a boost, instead of paying attention to fake rumors, they would sleep better nights. The typothetæ is only too anxious to start, or see started, such rumors in the hope of demoralizing the rank and file of printers.

Are you using scab tobacco and failing to call for the label on your goods? DON'T!

Are you doing your best to aid each other and the officers of your union by attending the meetings and cheerfully accepting committee appointments and doing your best on same? Do!!

Gigantic failure of No. 2 for the typothetæ took place at San Francisco. No. 1 was at St. Louis. Will they try the proverbial No. 3?—and call it off? Might just as well call it off now and put their money to better uses. Some of it might well be spent in educating their fellow printers in the ascertaining of cost. It would mean better things for us all if they could figure well enough to make a good profit instead of trying to combat the eight-hour day.

Business in the job line still continues quiet, but will no doubt pick up with the advent of cooler weather.

The view of the Home that accompanied the August JOURNAL will serve to enlighten a large portion of the membership of the magnificent institution maintained by us for our infirm or sick members.

Are you asking the merchants with whom you trade to have the label on their printing? Do!!

McAuslan & Wakelin's department store is still on the unfair list of the central labor union. Moral—Keep away and tell your friends—particularly the ladies.

Do you know of any non-union printers? If so, prevail upon them to embrace unionism—it's a good thing to hug.

Brother Dirks says that the Society of Typographical Journal Correspondents is composed of about twenty-five members, with the number slowly increasing. Just think of it! Twenty-five members with 650 unions in the country! We would be glad to hear from these unions regularly, if only a few words. We have a publication in THE JOURNAL that will compare favorably with any of the trade union papers. Let us not, however, be satisfied with having a good one; let it be better and then best. We printers ought to have the best and most interesting magazine going; and we can have if we all cooperate to this end. I find that our members, traveling around the country, like to hear from home and of the doings there.

In reading the correspondence of the different unions of New England I see frequent mention of our organizer, Charles T. Scott. He is certainly a hustler these days, and, from all accounts, is putting in some good strokes for the eight-hour day.

A. J. Hunter, foreman of the Transcript, has this year varied his method of spending his vacation. A part of it was spent driving and a part trolleying.

Frank H. Wade, also of the Transcript job room, took his turn vacationing to the tune of two weeks.

Miss Christianna Slocombe, of Deerfield, has accepted the position of proofreader at the Transcript.

Louis M. Dufault and wife spent their vacations among the lakes of central Massachusetts.

E. S. ALDEN.

NOTES FROM THE UNION PRINTERS' HOME.

Thanks!

Walter S. Jarboe, bearing credentials from Muscatine No. 251, recently enlisted in our Home guards.

Thomas Sharp, an aged member of Big Six, admitted last January, vacated July 18, and returned to New York city. The altitude was too much for genial old Tom. This was his second trial here.

Painters, calciminers, etc., have again been at work about the buildings, making the rooms more comfortable and attractive.

Henry R. Wray, secretary of the Colorado Springs chamber of commerce, recently inspected our institution preparatory to visiting the Toronto convention and booming things for our next annual gathering in this city.

At this writing the Home has 140 residents, just double the number (70) of July, 1896.

Clarence J. Wilson, from Denver No. 49, was admitted to the Home on July 21. James J. Fay, from No. 6, also recently joined us, and was assigned to a room in the hospital annex.

Fifteen of our residents picnicked in Cheyenne Canyon on July 21, and had an enjoyable time. Lots of good things to eat, music on guitar and violin, accompanied by singing, were special features of the occasion.

J. H. Waters, president, and D. C. MacWatters, general passenger agent of the Cripple Creek Short Line Railroad, were recent visitors to the Home. Their surprise at the hospitality, beauty and grandeur of our institution was inexpressible in words; so they afterward extended a complimentary invitation to all our residents for a round-trip excursion to Cripple Creek, Victor, Goldfield, Anaconda and Independence, on July 27. Some 120 responded, and the trip was the greatest treat given to the "boys" (and women and girls, too) since the establishing of the Home. The train started at 8:30 A. M. and returned at 4 P. M. The trip embraced over forty miles of the grandest mountain scenery in the world, and ended in a ride through the gold mining districts on the Short Line traction cars. Mr. and Mrs. Deacon, who were with the excursionists, furnished all with a splendid lunch on the cars and drinks of Manitou mineral water. General Agent MacWatters also extended personal favors. A full meeting of the Home residents was called by Rowland Hill, chairman, the following Saturday, at which appreciative resolutions were passed, and Secretary C. A. Gallagher was instructed to write personal letters of thanks to the Short Line management for their magnificent kindness and liberality, and also to Mr. and Mrs. Deacon, Alderman Patton, D. C. MacWatters and the Chamber of Commerce for special courtesies. The excursionists had their photos taken in groups at St. Peter's Dome (10,500 feet) and at Hoosier Pass (10,360 feet). In addition to the superintendent and matron, Henrietta and Proctor Deacon, Miss Houston (our chief nurse), Miss Laura Edinger, Miss Maud Suter, Mrs. Eugene Portner, Mrs. A. B. Stindle, General Manager Waters, General Agent MacWatters, and Henry Russell Wray (secretary of Chamber of Commerce) accompanied the residents on the trip. The wonderful engineering ingenuity displayed in building this railroad, as well as its scenic grandeur, is marvelous beyond conception. Its cost was more than $4,500,000 for the forty miles. The excursion was thoroughly appreciated and made lasting impressions upon the minds of the participants, and to in some measure show our gratitude, the resolutions of thanks were artistically printed and framed and presented to the Short Line officers by the Home chapel.

There are at least 10,000 tourists visiting Colorado Springs at present, and hundreds register at the Home. They keep our genial usher, Mr. Hunter, quite busy nowadays.

E. S. Sherman, of Denver No. 49, delegate-elect to the Toronto convention, and C. J. Dillon, of the Kansas City Star, were among our Sunday visitors in July.

The Elks' band favored us with a Sunday morning concert July 30, from the front balcony of the hospital annex.

A party of typo picnickers in the mountains, one of whom hid a lunch basket for a ramble, returned to find it empty. "Why," he exclaimed, "somebody ate ours." "That's what we're going to have," retorted another union printer. "Have what?" "Eight hours." Guess he was about right.

The "boys" are indebted to A. L. Patton, tobacconist, and D. C. MacWatters, passenger agent, for cigars during our recent trip on the Short Line.

It may be rather poor consolation to suffering people to be reminded of the saying of the unlucky farmer, "It mought 'ave bin wuss," but it is often true philosophy.

John D. Coughlin, former resident of the Home from No. 16, but who has been working at the trade in Denver for about a year past, has returned to Chicago. He spent a day with his old comrades here August 1, and left for the Windy City the next evening. John was suffering from tuberculosis when he first came to our institution, last September, but left us (in six months) completely restored to health.

Mr. and Mrs. H. O. Reichert, of Seattle, Wash., recently visited the writer at the Home. Mr. Reichert was a comrade at the case in Dayton, Ohio, some fifteen years ago, but is now selling pianos in Seattle. They were on their way to Salt Lake City.

John Nelson, of No. 76, has vacated and returned to Terre Haute. He came to the Home last November, and now considers his health sufficiently improved to take care of himself. August H. Ulmer, of No. 49, after a short sojourn with us, returned to Denver entirely convalescent. C. J. Gallaher, of No. 16, admitted last June, recently returned to Chicago. He had in charge J. J. Shannon, admitted last March from the same union, afflicted with palsy, who also desired to return home.

Superintendent Deacon, accompanied by his daughter, Henrietta, left for the East, August 3, to visit various points before attending the Toronto convention.

Samuel Boll, resident member from Big Six, attended the Redmen convention held in Denver recently.

Ernest Webb, a Home resident from No. 91, returned to Toronto August 5. He was a member of that union's reception committee for the International Typographical Union delegates.

S. S. Culbertson, Columbia No. 101; D. Utterson, St. Louis No. 8; Herman H. Henry, Lincoln (Ill.) No. 327; John G. Badry, Aurora (Ill.) No. 291; William C. Stiehl, New York No. 6; E. E. Wagner, Topeka No. 121; John E. Hackett, Kansas City No. 80; W. N. Mappin, St. Louis No. 8; Mrs. Anna Pangborn, Ottumwa (Iowa) No. 73, and Miss Lena Schiele, St. Louis No. 8, were typographical visitors registered at the Home recently.

A party of convalescents from the hospital annex, chaperoned by Miss Houston, chief nurse, picnicked in the mountains August 14. They had a delightful recreation and an enjoyable spread.

Rev. George S. Weaver, our printer preacher from "Big Six," occasionally fills pulpits at the Springs and in the rural districts on Sundays.

Granville Hixson, superintendent linotype department of the U. B. Publishing House, Dayton, Ohio, recently made us a pleasant call on his way to Salt Lake City. Mr. Hixson is an old member of No. 57, and has been connected with the above-named establishment ever since 1872. He anticipates a general walkout on the eight-hour demand, as the local typothetæ have issued a published declaration that its members will adhere to nine hours. This declaration is signed by the proprietors of every prominent book and job office in the city, including the U. B. establishment. He has some hope, however, that some of them, if not all, will recede from their present position and thus avoid a general strike. No. 57 has about 150 members.

Dr. I. R. Robinson, president of the Garden of the Gods Chautauqua, furnished the Home residents with admission season tickets to the meetings. Many attended, and were highly entertained. This favor was granted through the efforts of Capt. H. P. Macloon, veteran resident from No. 49.

We were favored with a stereopticon exhibition on the evening of August 3, which consisted of pictures of pueblos and manners and customs of New Mexican Indians, concluding with sketches of Colorado scenery and the Union Printers' Home and surroundings. It was given by Superintendent Deacon and Charles M. Carter previous to taking the apparatus to the Toronto convention to help boost Colorado Springs for our annual gathering in 1906.

A private collection of old books on miscellaneous subjects, some of which are very interesting, and all marked "Amos J. Cummings, from W. R. Smith, United States Botanical Gardens, Washington, D. C.," is the latest donation to the Home's rapidly increasing library. O. LANGFORD.

Colorado Springs, Colo.

PITTSBURG, PA.

Well, we did not get the 1906 convention. Now, you who sent the meeting elsewhere can not understand what you missed, besides the benefit it would have been to the craft about Pittsburg; then, too, we have a famous springs here also. Claremont is only nine miles from the city proper and is open to all who care to journey up the Allegheny river for say thirty, sixty and ninety days, or even a little longer.

We look for a big time here on Labor day. Don't one of you fail to turn out. Now that we will not get the International Typographical Union meeting we will need to show our individual strength by turning out in full force.

Resolutions were passed by No. 7 at the August meeting denouncing the George E. Keith Company for running a union shoe factory and refusing to run their printing office in like manner. Their "Walkover" shoe is very popular about Pittsburg, and all brothers will please note the above fact when purchasing their next shoes. You can not afford to patronize a concern of this type.

Another matter of importance to No. 7 and all union men in this vicinity is the fact that one Francis X. Barr is again out for office. We boycotted him before, and "he just got out by the skin of his teeth." The tidal wave for citizens' party was all that saved him, and we certainly expect to defeat him at the November election. No union man can afford to vote for a man who hates the ground our organization treads and would shut off our supply of breathing air if it was in his power.

At this writing we have an application for membership from a fellow who will, no doubt, be made an example of. He is now in poor health and wants a card for no other purpose but to go to Colorado Springs. Though he has been whitewashed four times, he still thinks another trial should be given him.

On Saturday, August 26, the employes of Perley Bros. had a very successful and pleasurable outing at Rock Point grove. The committee was made up from the several departments, and no pains were spared to make all who attended enjoy themselves to the fullest degree.

Our membership is still on the upward road; 549 was given out as the total at the August meeting.

It has been a long time since business was duller than it has been here for the last five or six weeks. All lines of work will, no doubt, get better in the next few weeks.

The past month added two more to the list of members bereaved by losing their helpmates. Just six wives of members have died in the last nine months. Sad indeed it is when death calls from the home the wife and mother, whose particular aim in life had been to bless and help her husband and children. During the month the wife of Jacob Armstrong was very suddenly called away.

At 5:45 A. M. Sunday, July 30, death visited the home of brother John G. Crammond and took his beloved wife, Fannie Hunter.

The members of No. 7 tender their sympathy to all those bereft.

Be sure to read the article entitled "A Query," which will be found in this issue.
